Nevertheless, believing in freedom of speech for others as well as for ourselves, we must not attempt to abuse or silence them.

Is it that freedom of speech is only for the militarists, the industrialists, the munition makers? I wonder.

Possibly it is this:

Democracy means an equality of opportunity.

This is neither a question of Texas nor New York, but of common-sense Americanism under the Bill of Rights including our conception of the Declaration of Independence. (See IV, Portions of Bill of Rights and Declaration of Independence.)

This issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will reach through subscriptions, distribution, colleges, libraries, reprints, and possibly in editorials and newspapers, millions of Americans. I have given the book word for word, sentence for sentence, and have described the red color as well as the blue. If there is anything wrong in that booklet, I should like for the editors of America to say so. If there is anything wrong in standing for the Bill of Rights, for liberty of speech, and the processes of democracy, I want to know about that. If this country is to abandon democracy, I should like to know that, too. More than anything, however, I should like to see what the rank and file of the ex-soldiers of America think. I do not know that they can get full expression of their views but I am confident, from my contact with them, that if the ordinary, common soldier has anything to say, he will want to maintain his own liberty at least—and I am sure, the liberty of others. On the surface this appears to be an unimportant matter, but it is really extremely important.

I hope the people of New York will see that common sense prevails.

AMERICANISM: WHAT IS IT?

As I said in the beginning, the whole book is only around 1,200 words, something less than an ordinary-sized book review. This document is said to be outrageous, and I want the American people to read every word of it, just to show you what some people say is left-wing socialism or communism. The following is a complete description, with full text of book:

Cover in blue and red, touches of gold; eagle red, with words at bottom in blue, "Americanism: What Is It?" Inside is a picture of the torch of liberty, with the words, "To American youth"; next page the words, "1936—Americanism Committee—New York County American Legion." The full text follows:

AMERICANISM

Every American Legionnaire pledges himself "to foster a 100-percent Americanism."

What is meant by "Americanism"?

This word is used by very different sorts of people. Courageous citizens, striving for the common welfare of mankind, proclaim their Americanism and so do others scheming for the narrow and special interests of their own selfish crowd. These groups, holding contradictory ideas of Americanism, call each other un-American.

Yet to distinguish real Americanism from counterfeit is not difficult. The true American spirit—Americanism—is expressed in a determined and magnificent human struggle to achieve democracy, justice, and liberty. The fundamental aim of this struggle is to maintain for all Americans the opportunity to enjoy the abundance of nature and to acquire such products of their cooperative labor as are essential to their life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness.

Justice means the equality of all before the law.

Neither democracy nor justice is possible without liberty. Liberty means opportunity for self-expression and self-development. It guarantees, among other freedoms, the freedom of religious worship, and above all else freedom of speech. Liberty demands freedom of speech because without freedom of speech there can be no search for the truth. This search is vital to Americanism; for unless great numbers of people constantly seek and discover new truths we cannot know how to make our world a better place in which to live.

Freedom of speech includes freedom of inquiry, freedom of discussion, and, most important, freedom of education. The freedom of teachers to teach facts without bias and of scholars to learn facts without bias must never cease. Only by means of education, by knowing about all things, can we equip ourselves to search for and recognize the truth.

Never was it more necessary than now for all Americans to support their right to freedom of speech and freedom to listen and learn. We live in a period of bewildering changes. Some nations have shifted convulsively from one form of government to another overnight; others waver between various forms. We face the fact that many people, recently converted to new and undemocratic forms of government, are eager to bring about similar changes here in America. Some of their ideas may be new to us; some may seem dangerous. Nevertheless, believing in freedom of speech for others as well as for ourselves, we must not attempt to abuse or silence them.

Believing in freedom of speech, Americans practice tolerance. Tolerance is not a feeble or a negative virtue. It means "to bear." Sometimes it is difficult to bear with opinions which seem absurd or dangerous. Yet it is necessary to do so if we are to understand them and test them with our own intelligence, make use of the good, and discard the unsuitable. Out of this clash of opinion and this experimentation comes progress toward truth. This is the first lesson in any science.

It is well for present-day Americans to remember that in America, as elsewhere in the world, some of the most sincere patriots have been abused by the intolerant of their own day, who made no effort to understand them. George Washington, as a British subject, holding ideas of liberty for the American Colonies, was abused as a traitor. The abolitionists, seeking the freedom of the slaves, were denounced as fools and crooks by those who desired democracy, justice, and liberty for themselves but not for people whose skins were of a different color. Abraham Lincoln once said: "The shepherd drives the wolf from the sheep's throat, for which the sheep thanks the shepherd as his liberator, while the wolf denounces him for the same act as the destroyer of liberty."

Our own history teaches us that great and good changes, marking advances in our civilization, have frequently resulted from ideas which, because they were new and different, were rejected by the intolerant.

We learn that the great man is that pioneer who has the foresight to make new plans and the courage to express his ideas for the use of society. We say that he is "ahead of his time." Americans, therefore, are not afraid of change. A society which does not permit change does not permit growth or improvement. It is dead.

When our American Constitution was drafted the Americans were less than 5,000,000 colonists, struggling to conquer nature in a world timed to the leisurely sailing vessel and oxcart. It was before the first steamboat. Many are the changes which inventions and discovery have since wrought. Today we fly the mails to the Orient. No longer are we a handful of isolated colonists, working with primitive tools, but a great industrialized Nation of over 125,000,000, linked to the rest of the world by radio, steamship, and plane. Today the welfare of peoples on the opposite side of the globe is of definite importance to our own welfare.

Invention and discovery have changed the life of our country. Invention and discovery will continue to bring about change. The heroic framers of the Constitution recognized this fact and made provisions for it. For they believed that change could be accomplished by means of orderly and democratic processes of government. Wise men know that the use of violence, producing chaos, is not only a savage but a wasteful, therefore stupid, means of bringing about change. Use of violence breeds more violence. If civilization is to develop, reason must take the place of brute force.

In a democracy citizens are not ruled by force and told by the State what they shall think. Americans, in their struggle for democracy, stand forever opposed to dictatorship by a person or by any special group. For dictatorship means the end of tolerance; it means the intolerant suppression, by an armed force, of democracy, justice, and liberty.

Americans realize that the ideals of democracy, justice, and liberty have not been completely attained. But we are not discouraged, for we know also that with the discovery of truths our imagination is trained, our minds learn to search for more and more truths. When the baby has learned to crawl it has not learned all that there is to know; it must yet learn to walk. To the mind of an intelligent man the horizon is always far ahead. With faith in our ideals we continue this exciting search for truths in order that we may build a better life for ourselves and our children.

True American patriotism, or a "100-percent Americanism", is a 100-percent belief in democracy, justice, and liberty. To preserve this the patriot must take an active part in the political life of the community and the Nation. For unless we meet our obligations as responsible citizens, unless we share the responsibilities of directing the activities of the State by preparing to vote intelligently, to hold public office honestly, our hard-won privileges may be lost. Only by sturdily holding to this struggle for these ideals can we defeat ignorance and tyranny and preserve democracy, justice, and liberty.

The following appears on the last page:

One thousand copies have been issued for those students awarded Americanism medals by the American Legion of New York County. This booklet is not for sale. The Legion makes grateful acknowledgment to the following citizens whose generosity has made this publication possible: For the typography, hand-set in Poliphilus and Blado, to Press of the Woolly Whale; for the text paper, Arak, to Whitehead & Alliger; for the cover paper, Kinkami, to Japan Paper Co.; for the engraving of the illustrations, to Walker Engraving Corporation; for electrotypes of the pages, to Flower Steel Electrotype Co.; for the binding, to H. Wolff; and for the printing, to William E. Rudge's Sons.

Now, what is wrong with that? Is it wrong to be for liberty and freedom? Is it wrong to be for the things that our forefathers stood for? Is it wrong to be against dictators, and instead to be for democracy, justice, and liberty?

EDITORIALS AND NEWS COMMENT

The first news story that I saw concerning this was on March 25, 1936, and printed in the conservative New York Herald Tribune. The headlines in the newspaper said, as follows: "County Legion demands free speech for all." The newspaper went on to show that the American Legion posts—there are 100 of them in New York—interpreted it as a "marked liberalization of the Legion's traditional conception of Americanism", and there followed a complete story in a very friendly manner by this conservative newspaper.

The headlines of today, April 28, 1936, in the Herald Tribune are of a different tenor. They say:

Legion (this refers to National Legion) rebukes its New York group on "free speech"—Americanism head calls county committee book "distortion" of principle—Local body is near rift—Resignations threatened if pamphlet is banned.

It is interesting to note, too, that throughout the Nation the original action of the New York County American Legion in publishing this little book received widespread editorial praise from the most conservative newspapers and magazines in the United States. For instance, the Boston Evening Transcript on Friday, March 27, 1936, had an editorial entitled "Straight Shooting by a Legion Post"—although they were referring to all the Legions of New York County—and they said concerning the statements in the book "that declaration is not only true but richly significant on account of its source." Then it said as follows:

Would that all members of the joint committee on education in the Massachusetts General Court might read and ponder this potent statement of American ideals as issued under the auspices of the American Legion in New York. Would that many of the speakers who heckled and insulted the leading educators of Massachusetts during recent hearings on the teachers' oath law might receive the New York Legion's pamphlet and learn from it what is the true nature and value of America and Americanism.

On March 25, 1936, the New York World Telegram, the liberal Scripps-Howard newspaper, commented on the action of the posts. In an editorial Wednesday, March 25, 1936, entitled "Real Americanism", it said, in part, as follows:

The Legion, we believe, has seldom stood upon firmer ground.

Then, after quoting several paragraphs of the little book concerning tolerance, liberty, and democracy, the editorial said as follows:

When the Legion talks in that fashion, stemming back directly to the Declaration of Independence, it is living up to its most patriotic avowals. There is no place here for cynicism. We would honor the New York Legion for its sentiments and encourage it to defend them against any attack.

AMERICAN LEGION PREAMBLE

For God and country we associate ourselves together for the following purposes:

To uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States of America; to maintain law and order; to foster and perpetuate a 100-percent Americanism; to preserve the memories and incidents of our associations in the Great War; to inculcate a sense of individual obligations to the community, State, and Nation; to combat the autocracy of both the classes and the masses; to make right the master of might; to promote peace and good will on earth; to safeguard and transmit to posterity the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy; to consecrate and sanctify our comradeship by devotion to mutual helpfulness.

I desire to call attention to the fact that the promise "to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States of America" includes the Bill of Rights and freedom of speech, press, conscience, and religion for everybody.

IV

PORTIONS OF BILL OF RIGHTS AND DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

(1) Article I, Bill of Rights:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

(2) Article IV, Bill of Rights:

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized.

(3) Portion of the Declaration of Independence:

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

THE 14 POINTS OF THE RED MENACE

Since red in itself is a sin, a logical dissertation on the effects is in order. If red should be entirely removed, however, there might be trouble. A study of the color red follows analytically for those who desire to be apprised of its evil character:

1. Congressman SIROVICH, of New York, cannot wear his red carnation in the lapel of his coat. He will simply die. Florists will protest.

2. New Yorkers going hunting up-State cannot wear red flannels. Many will catch pneumonia, flu, and colds. Will help doctors and undertakers but hurt general welfare of citizens.

3. Red wines prohibited. Discrimination as to white wines. No use in going to Italian restaurants. Grape growers will protest. People will get drunk, anyway.

4. Seeing "red" will also be abolished. In this many red baiters will suffer serious inhibitions and mental maladjustments.

5. Lure of red-headed girls; handsomeness of red-headed boys to be eradicated by Federal law. Will cause importation of nonfading German dyes to make color of hair different. This will hurt "Buy American" campaign; besides, in this case, the importation will be a metamorphosis from communism to fascism.

6. Red herrings cannot be drawn across issues. This would also be a blow to red baiters. Old pals of Al Smith on Fulton Fish Market will protest.

7. Music, Red Sails in the Sunset, popular hit, no doubt subversive, communistic, atheistic, anarchistic, and other things worse, must not be allowed.

8. Children, the little dears, must be free of red stick candy. This sounds innocent, but one cannot realize how sinister candy can be. It is understood they eat red candy in red Russia, therefore we must stop it here.

9. Red traffic lights abolished; substitute color not determined; will give work to scientists. Accidents.

10. Children, in getting diplomas, must not be allowed red ribbons.

11. Red tape must be made blue; however, the change of colors will not affect red-tape psychology or human nature.

12. The high curtains in the Supreme Court, which are red, or near red, must be substituted at once. This would even shock the Liberty Leaguers, the National Manufacturers Association, and also the United States Chamber of Commerce, meeting in solemn conclave in this, our National Capital today.

13. Red ink will be abolished; and this is really good, for then there would be no depression. With only black ink the profit system would be assured ad infinitum.

14. Bulls will not get mad any more. This may cause serious difficulties in certain Latin American relations.

ROBINSON-PATMAN PRICE-CONTROL BILL

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by including in the RECORD a radio speech delivered by me last Saturday night.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio speech delivered by me, in opposition to the Robinson-Patman price-control bill in a joint debate, Senator BENSON of Minnesota taking the affirmative side of the debate. The address was broadcast by the National Broadcasting Co. national hook-up, Saturday night, April 25, at 7:30 p. m.:

My friends of the radio audience, I am happy for the opportunity to address you on this most important subject, the Robinson-Patman price-control bill, and before proceeding I want to thank the National Broadcasting Co. in according me the privilege of carrying my views to you. The able Senator dividing this time with me, but who is standing on the opposite side of the fence, I fear, has been enlisted in support of this measure without, perhaps, going into the disastrous results that would follow to the consuming public should this bill happen to become a law. I am most amazed that Senator BENSON should be here in support of this bill, being a Farmer-Labor Senator in our Congress, when the American Farm Bureau Federation is actively opposing the bill, as is also the National Milk Producers' Federation, both organizations consisting of a large percentage of membership enlisted from the State represented by the able gentleman from Minnesota. In addition to which the Independent Grocers' Alliance, better known as the I. G. A., comprising a membership of 20,000 independent grocers, is also in opposition to this bill.

In the short time allotted to me it is hard to cover every point involved in this very voluminous measure, and I am not going to attempt to approach the subject from a legal point at all, as I am not a lawyer. However, I am led to believe by men of high legal training that this measure, if passed, will not stand the test of court. This particular legislation was drafted by a group of wholesale grocers as a substitute for codes secured under the now extinct N. R. A., and is nothing more nor less than a price-control bill. It is not a monopoly measure. While originally conceived and launched by the group of wholesalers just referred to, its effect would be operative as against all chain stores, whether they be groceries, drugs, or five-and-ten, and, unfortunately, would also affect adversely the merchant, large or small, that might be operating only one store. I, therefore, want to approach the subject from three points of view, namely, the ill effect that it would have on all distributors of merchandise; the ill effect it would have on labor; and the higher cost of living that would be passed on to all consumers, both large and small wage earners.

First. The distributor of merchandise would be stymied in his progress for advancement of his business. His merchandising methods, no matter how sound and careful he might carry on, would be affected. His initiative, to grow from a small institution, to one of greater magnitude, would be retarded, and would simply, in reality, return us to the "horse and buggy days", developing merchants that would still illuminate their stores with kerosene lamps instead of the modern system of electrification, which indicates progress and spells safety. To illustrate, I recall a visit to a town in West Virginia 3 years ago, which was the place where I was born. A town which had grown from a population of 8,000, when I left there 40 years ago, to a city of 80,000 people today. There, to my amazement and delight, I found mercantile institutions still carried on by the original owners, or by the sons or members of the family of the original owner. This, in the face of what the proponents of the Robinson-Patman bill claim, does not occur, as their contention is that the chain stores, in all lines, is working as an octopus that will sooner or later destroy the independent dealer.

I personally visited a drug store formerly operated by a friend of mine, since deceased; the location is the same as it was 40 years ago; but, as a result of progressive methods, is still being operated by the son of the original owner, enjoying good business and making progress, and this in the face of various chain stores that have entered in competition to the original village drug store. I could dwell on this subject at great length, but on account of the limited time the illustration given below also holds good in connection with grocers, butchers, drygoods, clothing, shoes, hardware, and every line of merchandise in the town mentioned above. I feel sure my listening public know of similar conditions existing in their communities, and they would make the same report in support of the merchant that devoted his time to progress and refused to "lay down and play dead" just because a chain-operated store opened in his particular community.

I might add, at this point, that the independent merchant, large or small, that is seeking legislation of this type, will be forced to pay higher prices for his goods by reason that the person from whom he secures his merchandise will have been legislated into a preferred position.

I referred above to how labor, in my judgment, would be affected as a result of this type of legislation, as it would, I am convinced beyond any question, increase the price of goods to the distributor, and, in turn, naturally, to consumers. As a result of this, the bill would have an immediate effect on labor on account of reducing consumption. This, in turn, would reduce the volume of manufacturing, thus leading up to a reduction of the wage scale or the laying off of people employed in labor in the lines affected.

Coming now to the consumer, it has been my belief, ever since I was privileged to become a Member of Congress, that legislation is intended to be beneficial to the majority of the population of the country; and as the consuming public of the United States, totaling 127,000,000 people, is the consuming public, naturally, if this legislation is adverse to them, it is not legislation for the best interests of the public at large, as it is the consumer who will suffer, through his pocketbook, if the Robinson-Patman bill becomes a law. Competition is going to continue, laws or no laws; and, as once stated by Henry Ford: "There is no way to limit competition. It is something that either is or is not. Barring competition is only a way of bringing in price fixing, and price fixing is not only the refuge of the inefficient man but also a stone wall across the path of progress."

The proponents of this bill, I believe, have been misled, under the delusion that legislation of this kind would result in savings for the consumer; but it is my belief that any interference with efficiency, capable management, and sound systems of fair merchandising would bring about just the opposite result. I will try to illustrate how I have arrived at this belief—which I don't think my able opponent can deny—that should this bill become a law the cost to the consumer would be increased.

Let us assume the law is in effect, and, to comply with that law, Mr. A, large manufacturer, now selling to B, C, D, and E, large department stores, or chain stores, and also selling some of his merchandise to the small corner store or suburban merchant, is forced, under this law, to distribute his goods at the same price to all dealers. What will Mr. Smart Manufacturer do? I'll tell you. He will eliminate the small dealer, who only consumes, perhaps, less than 10 percent of his product, and confine the distribution of his product to merchants B, C, D, and E, selling them all at the same price schedule in order to conform to the Robinson-Patman bill. Result: Mr. Little Dealer must seek other channels whereby to secure merchandise, from channels where the overhead of production is increased, due to the fact that that channel has no outlet through the larger merchant, who buys in large quantities.

Next result: Who will pay that additional cost? Answer: Mr. and Mrs. Consumer. That is as sure as two and two make four, and there is no law that can remove the hurdle that cannot be taken by the manufacturer to evade the operation of the Robinson-Patman act.

One other method: A group of small dealers can form themselves into a cooperative organization, in order to evade the operation of the law we are debating. Result, the independent distributor, namely the little merchant, who does not enter into this cooperative, in order to buy at quantity prices, is again sitting on the fence, paying top prices for his merchandise—and who is making up that price? Answer, the consumer.

To me it is elementary that you cannot go places, and be called progressive, if you are attempting to scuttle mass production or mass distribution. This great country of ours has progressed too far along the lines that initiative means something. When that is removed you will find that we will sink into the deep gullies of stagnation and, what was once hoped to be our goal, namely, to be the greatest country in the world, would be changed, and we would be at a standstill. There is no one that believes in progressive ideas more than I do, and there is no one that will support legislation to help advancement of this Nation more readily than I will, but, I, for one, refuse to go on record to support any legislation that I believe means a noose around the neck of the American public.

In this connection, I would like to take you back to 1934, during the closing days of the Seventy-third Congress, when the now extinct Frazier-Lemke bill was up for final passage.

At that time I spoke in opposition to the bill and expressed the belief that even though I was not a lawyer the Frazier-Lemke bill would not stand the test of court. This belief has since been justified, as the Supreme Court, about a year ago, handed down a unanimous decision declaring the law unconstitutional. At the same time that I spoke in opposition to the Frazier-Lemke bill, I expressed the belief that it would work a hardship on the farmer in connection with securing further finanical assistance. That belief has also been justified, because during the time that the Frazier-Lemke bill was in effect, prior to the decision of its unconstitutionality, the financing of farms was a hardship to the agricultural citizens of this country.

I simply make this point to bring to your attention that it is my belief that the Robinson-Patman bill will follow the same course as the late lamented Frazier-Lemke bill, namely, that it will not stand the test of the court; and secondly, that it will bring a hardship to the consuming public of this Nation that I am so happy to claim as the place of my abode.

I believe further that a national law should not be passed whose objective is to prevent the economic price reduction of the essentials of life and thus, through artificial methods, increase the cost of living to the people of the United States, because I believe that the bill which we are now discussing prevents price reduction. Should the Robinson-Patman bill become a law, and I hope it never will, it is apparent to me that the retail cost to the consumer would rise from 15 to 20 percent, which would be approximately the differential between small methods of operation and large-scale manufacturing and distributing systems.

I could go on for hours, if I had the time, digging into figures, statistics, etc., to try to bring home to you the evils that would follow the passage of the Robinson-Patman bill, but I believe that I have struck the vital points involved.

In conclusion I want to say that my heart goes out to those misguided legislators who have been influenced, perhaps, by misrepresentation of results, to present such legislation; also to those that were influenced by a misconception and induced to enter a debate in support of such legislation.

I hope the Robinson-Patman bill will not pass, because if it does, the victim will be the public, and during times such as we have been going through the public has suffered sufficiently.

I thank you.

SELECT COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE EXECUTIVE AGENCIES OF THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. O'CONNOR, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following resolution (H. Res. 460, Rept. No. 2504) for printing in the RECORD:

Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a select committee of five Members of the House and that such committee is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study of all the activities of the departments, bureaus, boards, commissions, independent agencies, and all other agencies of the executive branch of the Government with a view to determining whether the activities of any such agency conflict with or overlap the activities of any other such agency and whether, in the interest of simplification, efficiency, and economy, any of such agencies should be coordinated with other agencies or abolished, or the personnel thereof reduced. The committee shall report to the House (or to the Speaker of the House, if the House is not in session) the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation.

That said committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or adjourned; to hold such hearings; to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents by subpena or otherwise, and to take such testimony as it deems necessary. Subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the Speaker of the House of Representatives or the chairman of said committee, and shall be served by any person designated by them or either of them. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Every person who having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee or any subcommittee thereof willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any questions pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102, chapter 7, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, second edition, 1878.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from New York when he intends to call up this resolution just presented for printing?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Subject to the wishes of the Speaker and the majority leader, it was thought possibly it might come in after the tax bill and before the next appropriation bill is taken up. Possibly sometime this week.

Mr. SNELL. May I ask the majority leader is it expected that the Navy Department appropriation bill will be commenced this week?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the expectation. It is expected we will take up general debate on the Navy Department appropriation bill when we finish the tax bill.

Mr. SNELL. But perhaps this resolution will be taken up first?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Perhaps this resolution will be taken up first. We have not decided that yet. It is possible we will take up this resolution before we consider the Navy Department appropriation bill.

THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include an address I delivered this morning at the Rivers and Harbors Congress.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me today at the Rivers and Harbors Congress:

The Brookings Institution, in a very penetrating study, recently presented the thought that the greatest bar to the return of prosperity is high prices and that the most effective way to raise the real income of the people is to reduce the cost of what they buy. At once the conclusion was challenged on the assumption that reducing costs meant reducing wages. Even the President of the United States, in his recent New York address, fell into that error.

The American people are not interested in reducing costs at the expense of the workingman, for they realize that the economic mechanism cannot function well unless the people as a whole have the means to buy all that the people as a whole produce. But the American people also know that in balancing capacity to produce and ability to buy, reducing prices is no less important than raising wages.

To me it seems that there are three important factors that prevent a downward adjustment of costs and thereby impede the resumption of that free flow of goods and commodities between willing producers on the one hand and willing buyers upon the other, upon which stable prosperity depends:

First, taxes which absorb 25 percent of the people's income, not only taking away one-fourth of their dollars, but increasing the prices of what those dollars can buy.

Second, interest at rates inherited from the pioneer period and out of line with present income levels, computed on a volume of debt disproportionate to national wealth.

Third, increasing transportation costs that tend to lengthen the distances between areas of production and centers of consumption.

We in Minnesota are 1,200 miles from the Atlantic seaboard. Our handicap in this respect is one which can be overcome only by finding cheaper means of transportation, and thereby increasing our net proceeds from what we have to sell and cutting the cost of what we have to buy.

It is not strange therefore that Minnesota has been a pioneer in the movement for developing waterways. While I was Governor of the State, I signed a bill creating a commission to work for a 9-foot channel in the upper Mississippi. As a member of the legislature and chairman of its appropriation committee, I sponsored the first appropriation ever made for financing an organization to bring to the attention of the country the need of a St. Lawrence seaway.

The St. Lawrence project has proceeded to the point where the Governments of the United States and Canada have written a treaty in which they agree jointly to construct the necessary locks, dams, and canals. That treaty has failed of ratification in the Senate, largely because of disagreement to a provision for the diversion of Lake Michigan water which was not acceptable to interests centered at Chicago.

Chicago has more to gain from the seaway than any other city or community in the country, for it would give her virtually an ocean port and insure her dominant position in the economy of the Middle West. The seaway would make Chicago the greatest transportation center in the world. I hope and believe that a basis of agreement can be found that will make it possible for the business and political leaders of Chicago to assume the leadership in the movement to bring the Atlantic seaboard into the heart of the continent.

Another source of opposition that I hope to see removed is that of the railroads, and especially of the railroads of the West and Middle West. Let it be granted that the eastern roads would temporarily lose some tonnage. Even that loss would be more than offset eventually by the creation in the interior of a better market for those eastern products which demand fast transportation and would continue to move by rail. But to the western roads the benefits would be direct and immediate. They now carry wheat only to the lake ports and coal only from the lake ports. They would continue to carry wheat and coal, but they would carry more wheat and coal, they would move wheat into a larger market when the lower transportation cost had placed the midwestern farmer into a better competitive position with the world, and they would bring in more coal for industries supplying the needs of a more prosperous Middle West.

What the railroads need today is not so much more tonnage and more revenue—although these would be desirable—as more railroad statesmanship. A generation ago the Northwest had a railroad statesman—James J. Hill.

It has been said that the difference between a politician and a statesman is that the politician keeps an eye on the next election, the statesman on the next generation. The railroad politician keeps his eye on this year's revenues; Mr. Hill kept his on the increasing opportunities for income out of the growing tonnage supplied by expanding communities.

In 1887 a waterway convention was held at Superior, Wis. James J. Hill was there. He had operated dray wagons in St. Paul and steamboats on the Mississippi and the Red Rivers. He had bought two parallel streaks of rust stretching across the prairie and had made them into a railroad, beyond the western terminus of which the Indian still pursued the buffalo. He had extended a precarious line to the head of the Lakes. To the East lay five great bodies of water, beyond them the St. Lawrence River, and beyond it the sea. The empire builder's eyes were on that sea.

Three rocky barriers stood in the way, one at the Soo, the second at the present site of the Welland Canal, and the third at the rapids of the St. Lawrence. Addressing the convention, the great railroad man said:

"I am forced with regret, as an old steamboat man on the Mississippi River and the Red River, to turn my vision away from these rivers because, as transportation mediums, their clock has struck 12; and I must therefore turn my vision to the Great Lakes to the eastward and to the development of a vast internal and interstate commerce and transportation, which shall connect the great agricultural empire of the West with the great commercial and manufacturing empire of the East. I find that the Soo has a depth of water of only 10 or 11 feet, which is a blockade to water transportation. Give me 15 feet of water at the Soo and I will put on a line of boats on the Great Lakes carrying a burden of 3,500 tons each, and in doing this I will weld water and railroad transportation and bring costs of commerce down to the lowest possible point."

Congress appropriated money to open the blockade at the Soo, Canada dug the Welland Canal, and only the third barrier remains. If there is any pioneering spirit left in the land, it will not be long before the commerce of the Middle West will flow unimpeded to the sea and thence to the ports of the world. And if there are now any empire builders among the railroad men of the country, their voice and influence will be with us and not against us.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL, 1937

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I should like to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, after the House passed the District of Columbia appropriation bill there were 87 amendments put on the bill by the Senate, one of those amendments alone adding an increase of $3,000,000, to be contributed to Washington out of the United States Treasury. As soon as the bill passed the Senate carrying the 87 amendments, the Senate asked for a conference and appointed conferees.

The House promptly agreed to the conference asked for and has appointed conferees. The House conferees, I might add, have always met the Senate with an open mind in a full and free conference, and have given and taken, and have always, except on one occasion, when there was a sine die adjournment without any bill, reached an amicable conclusion that apparently was satisfactory to both bodies.

This morning's Washington News prints a statement quoting the chairman of the subcommittee of the Senate, who will be at the head of the managers on the part of the Senate, and will be chairman of the conference, that concerning the Senate's 87 amendments to this bill the Senate will waste no time in conference with the House conferees, but will insist on their changes, and if the House conferees will not agree, the Senate will pass a "continuing resolution", which would carry with it the $5,700,000 Federal contribution to the District. Likewise the Washington Times today quotes the chairman of the Senate subcommittee, who will be chairman of the conference, as stating that "the Senate will stand pat", and assured the city that Washington would get the $5,700,000 contribution from the United States Government, stating if the House conferees did not agree to it the Senate would pass a continuing resolution which would carry it, so that in either alternative there would be a Federal contribution of $5,700,000 to the District.

I am hopeful, Mr. Speaker, that the chairman of the Senate subcommittee will deny that he authorized the press to make these assertions of fact, for the Washington newspapers should understand that if no bill should be agreed upon the House of Representatives will have just as much say as will the Senate about what would be embraced in a continuing resolution and could refuse to pass anything if it so desired. I happen to know, Mr. Speaker, that a majority of the Members of the House of Representatives are not in favor of allowing one dollar of Federal contribution from the United States Treasury to the District, and if the Senate arbitrarily should refuse to agree upon an annual supply bill unless the House of Representatives bowed down to its will and granted a Federal contribution of $5,700,000, it might be when the House was called upon to pass a continuing resolution that it might provide therein that there shall be no Federal contribution whatever to the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937.

During my service here, Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have ever witnessed the chairman of a conference allowing the press to quote him as saying that if the managers of the House did not agree to demands of the Senate there would be no appropriation bill, but that the Senate would get all it wanted through a continuing resolution. I know that the House conferees are willing to meet the Senate conferees in a full and free conference, but they are not willing to be bulldozed.

The Speaker has been here longer than I have. I should like to know whether there is any precedent for that kind of a stand between the two Houses of equal standing and importance, relating to the comity that should exist between the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he knows of no precedent and he hardly believes there is one. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that rather than take a newspaper account he should communicate with the chairman of the committee. Of course, any conference between the two Houses will be expected to be a full and free conference.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly; and they always have had a full and free conference.

The SPEAKER. Otherwise, if that is not true, there is no object in having a conference.

Mr. BLANTON. And the House conferees have no intention otherwise than to meet the Senate conferees in a full, free, and fair conference, in a conscientious attempt to adjust the differences between the two Houses, but if the House conferees are expected to go into the conference, under such circumstances as are indicated in today's papers as coming from the chairman of the Senate conferees, where they were expected to accept all of the 87 Senate amendments, such a conference would be futile.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that that matter can be determined after the first conference has been held.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman reached the point where he believes everything he sees in the newspapers?

Mr. BLANTON. I know that this has come to me in several papers lately, but not so arrogantly expressed as in this morning's papers. But I want to make this statement, if the House will allow me: The responsibility of handling this bill was thrown upon my shoulders. I did not ask for it. I did not want it. It is hard, grinding work. It is an unpleasant task. Any Member who handles this bill, and performs his duty, will be unjustly criticized and abused and attacked by Washington newspapers. If I would go along with the local press, and agree to everything they want in Washington, they would play me upon the front pages as a great statesman, and a wonderful gentleman; but I will not do that, and because I will not let them rob our constituents I get this criticism from them daily.

I want to mention, Mr. Speaker, just what goes with and follows this responsibility. In the Washington Herald yesterday it was stated that the Washington plutocrats who do not like the House bill are taking up a collection in Washington now to spend as a campaign fund to try to defeat me for reelection because I have stood in their way. Defeat me for what? Because I handled the 83-page appropriation bill, which after 3 days' debate passed the House without a single amendment, and on a record vote only 26 Members voted against the bill. It must have suited the Members of the House of Representatives else they would have voted against it.

But because I have made a strenuous fight to keep communism out of the Washington schools, and would not agree to make a contribution of $5,700,000 to the District out of the United States Treasury, the Washington plutocrats are taking up a collection for a campaign to try to defeat me. This has happened to every single chairman this committee has had for 50 years. Consult Mr. Ben Johnson, of Kentucky, our Democratic chairman, or the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. Simmons, who ably represented the Republicans as chairman of this subcommittee, and all the other chairmen, upon whom they made such an unholy fight simply because they were carrying out the expressed will of the House.

This is all I care to say, Mr. Speaker, except that your conferees are going to do their duty.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the permission I had to extend my remarks on the District of Columbia appropriation bill expires today. On March 23, 1936, I obtained permission of the House to date such remarks on Friday, March 27, 1936. I have been delayed in getting some necessary data from different bureaus of the District government which I wanted to use, and it will be next Friday before I get some of the data. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the permission granted me be renewed so that my extension of remarks may be dated next Friday, May 1, 1936.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Texas extending his remarks on the District bill as indicated?

There was no objection.

THE REVENUE BILL OF 1936

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following unanimous-consent request which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask that the Clerk may read.

The Clerk read as follows:

I ask unanimous consent that in the engrossing of the pending bill (H. R. 12395), the Clerk of the House be authorized:

(1) To make such changes in the table of contents as may be necessary to make such table conform to the action of the House in respect of the bill;

(2) To make such clerical changes as may be necessary to the proper numbering and lettering of the various portions of the bill, and to secure uniformity in the bill in respect of typography and indentation; and

(3) To amend or strike out cross-references that have become erroneous or superfluous, and to insert cross-references made necessary by reason of changes made by the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12395) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12395, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time remains on each side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has 20 minutes remaining and the gentleman from North Carolina has 19 minutes remaining.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry the time remaining under my control is so brief, but I shall devote it to replying to many inaccurate statements made by majority members of the Committee in endeavoring to explain this legislative jargon of words and figures.

At the outset, let me say that I am absolutely opposed to increasing the present tax burden by any kind of a tax bill until the administration's wild orgy of expenditure has been stopped. Every dollar of unnecessary expenditure saved means a dollar of new taxes avoided. Do not forget that.

It is not giving the taxpayers of the country a square deal to keep piling on new taxes to fill the pockets of the administration's spendthrifts and "boondogglers." The taxpayers are entitled to value received for their money. If waste and extravagance were eliminated, present taxes doubtless would be sufficient to carry the load.

There are three ways to balance the Budget: First by imposing new taxes sufficient to meet expenditures; second, by reducing expenditures to meet existing tax revenues; and third, by a combination of reduced expenditures and increased taxes. The first course is absolutely out of the question, as it would necessitate doubling the present burdensome taxes. The people could not stand it and it would prolong the depression indefinitely. The second course, if strictly applied, might result in impairing the normal and necessary functions of government. Hence, the third course seems most desirable.

Expenditures can be reduced several hundred millions of dollars simply by eliminating waste. Hundreds of millions more can be saved by eliminating unnecessary and foolish expenditures. More millions can be saved by eliminating useless offices and bureaus, with their thousands of high-salaried political appointees. Still more millions can be saved by requiring the Democratic political campaign to be financed by the Democratic National Committee, rather than by the Federal Treasury.

If after expenditures have been reduced to a reasonable minimum by eliminating waste and extravagance, it is found that further taxes are needed, then is the time to come forward with a tax bill—not now.

Mr. Chester T. Crowell, former special assistant to Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau and an ardent New Dealer, in his recent pamphlet entitled "Recovery Unlimited", states that in his opinion higher taxes would not result in balancing the Budget, but would more than likely have an opposite effect. He estimates that the present tax structure, on the basis of 1929 conditions, would yield a revenue of close to $8,000,000,000, and concludes that the only way for the Government to increase its revenue is by business recovery. That, in my opinion, is sound doctrine. We must not forget that in taxation, as in other things, there is a point of diminishing returns. The present tax structure is more than ample if the Government would let business alone in its march toward recovery.

Before proceeding to a discussion of the bill I want to correct one statement that is repeatedly made on the floor of this House in regard to the Budget. We constantly hear it stated that the ordinary or regular Budget is balanced. The claim is made in behalf of this bill that it will balance the regular Budget. In this connection I want to quote from the testimony of the Director of the Budget, Mr. Bell, before the Ways and Means Committee. Mr. Bell was called before the committee at my request, and I asked him numerous questions about the present Budget set-up, particularly whether there was any authority in law for setting up an ordinary Budget and an extraordinary Budget. His reply was:

> There is no such thing in the United States as an extraordinary Budget. * * * We have no such thing in the United States Government accounting set-up.

I hope this sets at rest any further talk on this floor about balancing the regular Budget, because there is no such thing. We have only one Budget, and it has been from three to four billions of dollars in the red ever since Mr. Roosevelt took office, and there is no likelihood of any change at any time in the near future.

The pending measure is no more serious an effort to balance the Budget than was the President's share-the-wealth bill of last year. It causes the country to wonder what has become of the pledge in the Democratic platform calling for a balanced Budget, which Candidate Roosevelt accepted 100 percent. It brings to mind the statement which Mr. Roosevelt made in his economy message of March 10, 1933, that "too often in recent history liberal governments have been wrecked on rocks of loose fiscal policy" and the further statement in the same message that for 3 long years the country had been on the "road to bankruptcy."

It will be recalled that in his economy message of March 10, 1933, Mr. Roosevelt said that if the economies therein suggested were carried out—

> * * * There is reasonable prospect that within a year the income of the Government will be sufficient to cover the expenditures of the Government.

What happened? By the end of the following fiscal year of 1934 expenditures had increased nearly $2,000,000,000 as compared with 1932 and there was a deficit of nearly $4,000,000,000.

In his Budget message of January 3, 1934, Mr. Roosevelt said:

> My estimates for the coming fiscal year (1935) shows an excess of expenditures over receipts of $2,000,000,000. We should plan to have a definitely balanced Budget for the third year of recovery (1936) and from that time on seek a continuing reduction in the national debt.

What happened? The actual deficit for 1935 was three and a half billions, and the revised Budget for 1936, instead of being in balance, as promised, will probably show a deficit of around $4,000,000,000.

In his Budget message of January 3, 1935, the President made no promise of a balanced Budget. He merely stated that—

> The country will henceforth have the assurance that with the single exception of this item (work relief), every current expenditure of whatever nature will be fully covered by our estimates of current receipts.

Last September he said:

> The 1937 Budget is being prepared with a view to sharply decreasing the spread between income and outgo.

In his Budget message of last January the President gave up all hope of setting a definite date for a balanced Budget. The most he could say was—

> We approach a balance of the National Budget.

The fact is, however, that we are not approaching a balanced Budget. It is not balanced for the current year, and will not be balanced for 1937. Deficits are increasing instead of decreasing, and the deficit for 1936 or 1937, depending upon which one carries the bonus payment, will reach a new high. Deficits are increasing in spite of increased taxes and increased receipts from old taxes. The increase in expenditures is not wholly due to recovery and relief items. The regular, permanent expenditures increased from $2,800,000,000 in 1934 to $3,100,000,000 in 1935, and the Budget estimates indicate further increases to $3,600,000,000 in 1936 and $5,600,000,000 in 1937.

Thus it is evident that not only are reduced expenditures necessary from the standpoint of national solvency but from the standpoint of saving the taxpayer from a crushing burden of taxation, or from uncontrolled inflation, which, of course, is just another and more invidious form of taxation.

I repeat that I am opposed to any kind of tax bill until the administration's waste and extravagance have been stopped, but I would be opposed to this particular bill under any conditions.

It is the most unsound and discriminatory tax legislation I have ever seen proposed in my 23 years' experience as a Member of Congress, and it will have economic effects which are dangerous and far-reaching. It violates all principles of taxation, which is naturally to be expected from a measure which is not a tax bill to begin with. On the contrary, it is but a further effort to regiment business under the Federal taxing power along the lines proposed by that revolutionary-minded college professor, "brain truster" extraordinary, exponent of planned economy, and enemy of American ideals and institutions—Rexford G. Tugwell.

The majority report on the measure is so cleverly worded as to make it appear that the proposed plan of taxation is simply a slight amendment of the existing scheme. It is not that at all. Rather, it completely revolutionizes the present corporate-tax system. It abolishes the present corporate income tax of 12½ to 15 percent; it abolishes the capital-stock and excess-profits taxes; it abolishes the special taxes on improperly accumulated surpluses; all of which are tried and proven.

In place of these taxes it sets up a scheme for forcing the distribution of corporate earnings to stockholders. This is done by exempting corporations from any tax on their earnings where such earnings are wholly distributed and by taxing the entire income where any portion is retained, the rate increasing in amount as the proportion of the earnings retained to total earnings increases.

At this point I want again to refer to the method under which this has been done. It is estimated that we are doing away with $1,132,000,000 of assured revenue and are substituting for that an uncertain revenue from a new and untried source. One man—the Treasury Actuary—has made up the estimates of revenue to be raised by this measure. So far as I know he is a good Actuary, but where you ask one man to take the responsibility of submitting figures for the basis of the system, I say it is a mistake of the worst kind, I do not care how good the Actuary may be. I never saw the man until he came before the committee; but this, of course, is nothing against him. At the same time, however, the American people are entitled to check up on one man's figures when more than $1,000,000,000 of certain revenue is cast aside.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL], in his remarks the other day, made some reference to past proposals to tax undistributed income. The important thing to remember in connection with these proposals is that they have always been rejected as unworkable and unsound. Now, however, a proposal more vicious in its effect than any previous proposal is favorably reported to the House. But, thank Heaven, there is already some evidence that when this radical, unsound, and economically dangerous proposal has been "rubber stamped" by the Democratic majority in this body it will receive a rather thorough overhauling in another body, and we will not be able to recognize it when it comes back. At least I hope that will be the case.

Mr. Chairman, I have reason to believe that there is not a Member of this House who does not have the highest respect for the judgment of our congressional tax expert, Mr. Parker. His opinion on tax matters is held in equally high esteem in the other body. His reputation as a tax expert is Nationwide, and certainly his views on tax matters are entitled to the most careful and serious consideration.

Now, Mr. Parker has certain views regarding a tax on undistributed corporate income which he has expressed in the past. These views were not with respect to a proposal as radical as the present one, but with respect to less vicious forms. I do not wish to embarrass Mr. Parker by quoting his views at this time when he has worked so valiantly trying to help the majority write some kind of bill in accordance with the President's suggestions; but, of course, it must be remembered that he was not consulted at this time with respect to the policy involved in the present proposal, but was only acting under orders, just as Mr. Beaman, our able drafting expert, was doing.

In 1927 Mr. Parker made a very intensive study of our income-tax system and submitted a report to the Joint Committee on Taxation with respect to a number of matters. One section of this report touched upon the possibility of enacting a tax on undivided profits, and here are Mr. Parker's views regarding such a tax. I quote from page 54 of volume I of the Reports of the Joint Committee on Taxation:

> The most obvious objection to such a tax is the burden which it places on legitimate and proper business expansion. As a business expands not only does its plant and property increase but a larger working capital is required and it is desirable that reasonable accumulations of profits necessary for the expansion and stability of corporations should not be unduly burdened. * * * It is believed that a tax on the total accumulation of profits by corporations is not desirable, because in many cases it might cause the making of unwise distributions and prevent the accumulation of a reasonable and proper surplus.

Now, these are very real objections to a tax on undistributed income which Mr. Parker sets forth here. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL] do not seem to attach much weight to the evidence of practical businessmen who testified against the proposed plan during the hearings. The testimony of practical people seems to be obnoxious to them. Perhaps they will attach some weight to the evidence of Mr. Parker, which I have just quoted. They cannot accuse him of having any selfish interest in the matter.

Let me call your particular attention to the failure of our Democratic friends to appreciate the word used by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] last week. The gentleman from New York stated that he had looked through all the addresses of the President and those in authority with him but that he failed to find the word "thrift" mentioned. I recommend a study of the word "thrift" to the Democratic majority before they try to put this blooming bill into operation.

I want now to pass to another interesting subject, namely, that of simplicity. Yesterday the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON], who was brought forward on the Democratic side to prove that the moon is made out of green cheese, argued how simple this was, that even a man with as little brains as the gentleman from Massachusetts now addressing you could understand it if he wanted to. I thank the gentleman, but I neither want to understand it nor can I understand it. When the gentleman from Kentucky finished trying to prove how simple it was, he had succeeded in convincing the House that it was even more complicated than had been supposed.

The gentleman said that we looked through the bill trying to find an algebraic formula and were disappointed in not finding it. Our only disappointment was that the formula considered in the committee was so much plainer and simpler than the tables presented in the pending draft of the bill.

This is a bill for simplification, because that is the instruction from the President of the United States. I quote his language:

> Such a revision of our corporate taxes would effect great simplification in tax procedure, in corporate accounting, and in the understanding of the whole subject by the citizens of the Nation.

These are the words of the President with regard to this measure on which we are acting now. An understanding of the whole subject by the citizens of the Nation; even those with less brain power than I have, gaged by the gentleman from Kentucky, would be able thoroughly to understand it.

To get back, however, to this algebraic table on page 792 of the hearings, a gentleman by the name of Fernald was on the stand before the committee in an evening session.

In the course of his testimony he was interrogated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER], who asked permission of the Chairman to insert in the RECORD what had been stricken out in the final draft of the report of the subcommittee. That was on the 25th of March that this confidential draft was handed to the subcommittee. I do not know who prepared this table, and I do not think it makes much difference. Like Topsy, it just grew up; but when we got a final proof of the subcommittee's report, this algebraic table did not appear in it. However, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER] inserted this table, and I want to read it, because it is so simple. It is the simplest thing I ever saw. It is as follows:

> If the percentage which the undistributed net income is of the adjusted net income is not one of the percentages of the adjusted net income shown in schedule I or II, then the rate of tax shall be proportionate, being interpolated by the straight-line method: That is, by the formula—

There is the table which my good friend from Kentucky and his associates say is so simple. They say that all you have to do is to read the figures. Professor Einstein would probably say the same thing about his theory of relativity.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky rose.

Mr. TREADWAY. I would prefer not to yield. I just want to confirm the gentleman's simplicity. That is all I am doing. If anyone thinks it is so simple, as the gentleman says, let them just glance over the tables with the interpolations that appear with them under schedules I, I-a, II, II-a, and III.

Mr. Chairman, it takes 16 pages to describe what in the present law is contained in 16 lines, which are stricken out. It is plain enough. They have substituted 16 pages for 16 lines. Of course, it is awfully simple. But I want to suggest a little matter of advice to my good friend from Kentucky. Perhaps he is correct, and I would not be sure he is, but I hope he is for the sake of the accuracy of the Democratic majority around here. My advice to that gentleman is that as soon as this bill becomes law, and he admits he understands the ramifications of this simplicity, he resign from Congress, as much as we would miss him, and hang out his shingle as a tax expert under the 1936 act. Why, clients would clog the streets, and there would be more clients come to his office than are trying to get into some of these picture shows downtown on a Sunday afternoon. My gracious, why he would waste his energies around here is not understandable to me, and knowing his good judgment, I am sure we are going to have a vacancy in the delegation from Kentucky when he sets out the simplicity of this law for the thousands of clients who would follow around in his wake to make out their next return as covered by some of these 16 pages of simplicity or explanation worked out from an algebraic formula. It is a good while since I studied algebra. Fortunately, I shall not have much of an income tax to pay next year, anyhow. The Democrats have taken all of the prosperity out of my line of business; therefore I will not have to study up or employ the gentleman, although I do believe in view of the advertising I am giving him I might get a free income-tax report made up.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I will do my best for the gentleman.

Mr. TREADWAY. I thank the gentleman. I thought it was deserving of that much consideration, anyway.

Now let us compare, for a moment, the method of computing the tax under the present law and under the pending bill. We will start with the net income of the corporation, because both measures require the same adjustments in gross income up to that point.

The existing rates of corporate tax are set forth on page 14 of the comparative print of the bill in exactly 16 lines. It is all a very simple operation. The corporation applies a flat rate of tax to its net income.

The new scheme requires 16 pages in which to set forth the complicated rate structure, including the so-called relief provisions. Sixteen pages as against 16 lines. But that is only the beginning. Instead of applying a fixed rate to its net income, here is what a corporation has to do under the proposed bill.

After determining its net income, as under existing law, it must next compute its "adjusted net income" as defined. Then it must determine its "undistributed net income", which is defined as the "adjusted net income" minus the sum of the "dividend credit" provided in section 27 and the tax. The tax is imposed upon the "adjusted net income", but the rate of tax is fixed by the percentage which the "undistributed net income" bears to the "adjusted net income." All very simple. You cannot figure the tax until you know what the "undistributed net income" is, and you cannot figure that until you know what the tax is.

The examples of how the tax works out, as set forth on page 6 of the majority's report, are very much oversimplified. Even then they are very confusing, particularly examples 2 and 3, which I shall insert at this point.

Example 2: A corporation has an adjusted net income of $100,000. It has as yet declared no dividends, but it decides that it wishes to retain $22,500 net in surplus (in undistributed net income). The percentage of undistributed net income to adjusted net income is, therefore, 22½ percent. Since the rate of 22½ percent does not appear in schedule II, it is necessary to apply the rule immediately following the table in that schedule. This rule states that if the percentage is more than 20 and less than 30 that the rate of tax will be 9, plus six-tenths of the amount by which the percentage which the undistributed net income is of the adjusted net income (22½ percent in this case) exceeds 20. Applying this rule the rate of tax will be 9 plus six-tenths of 2½, or 10.5 percent. Then the amount of the tax will be 10.5 percent of $100,000, or $10,500, and the balance of the adjusted net income ($100,000 minus $22,500 minus $10,500) or $67,000 must be paid in dividends.

Example 3: A corporation has an adjusted net income of $20,000. It has as yet declared no dividends, but it decides that it wishes to retain $2,000 net in surplus (in undistributed net income). The percentage of undistributed net income to adjusted net income is, therefore, 10 percent. In such a case the corporation computes a tax under schedule II and under schedule III and is subject to whichever tax is the lesser. The schedule II tax is readily determined from the rate table included in that schedule. The rate for an undistributed net income of 10 percent of the adjusted net income is 4 percent. Then the tax under schedule II is 4 percent of $20,000, or $800. Therefore the dividend credit is $17,200. The tax is now computed under schedule III. A tax is first computed under schedule I on the whole $20,000 of adjusted net income. With 10 percent retained the rate is 1 percent and the tax is $200. To this tax is added a tax under schedule II computed on the amount by which the adjusted net income ($20,000 in this case) exceed $10,000. This excess is $10,000 and the rate under schedule II for a 10-percent retention is 4 percent. Then this added tax is $400. The total tax under schedule III is, therefore, $200 plus $400, or $600. But the tax under schedule II alone was $800, therefore, the taxpayer will have his tax computed under schedule III since that tax is the lesser—$600 as compared with $800. The effect of taking the tax computed under schedule III is to permit the $200 tax saving to be retained as surplus free of tax.

Example no. 1 can be ignored entirely, because there will hardly ever be a case where the undistributed net income of a corporation is an exactly even percentage of the adjusted net income. However, let us consider example no. 2 for just a moment. I say it is oversimplified. In the first place, it assumes that the undistributed net income is the amount retained in reserve. That is not what the proposed statute says. According to section 13 (a) (2), the "undistributed net income" is the "adjusted net income" minus the sum of the dividends paid and the amount of tax computed under the rate schedule. The tax, however, cannot be computed under either schedule I or schedule II without resort to algebra or some other form of higher mathematics, because you must deal with two unknown quantities, namely, the amount of dividends that will be available for payment and the amount of the tax. Under example 2 it is merely an assumption to say that because $22,500 is the amount to be retained it is also equivalent to the undistributed net income. This can be easily proven. Suppose the company wanted to retain 70 percent, or $70,000, under the example given. In applying the interpolative formula under schedule II, if the amount were regarded as the undistributed net income it would result in a rate of 55 percent being applied to the net income, although no rate higher than 42½ percent is actually contemplated by the bill. A corporation with $100,000 net income could not have a higher undistributed net income than $42,500 under section 13 (a) (2). This proves that the method adopted in the example of working out the tax is erroneous, false, and misleading. It also shows why algebra must be used to get a correct answer under the definition of "undistributed net income" under section 13.

The only way the tax can be worked out according to section 13 without resorting to algebra is under schedules I–a or II–a, which are based on the amount of dividends paid rather than on the amount of reserves. However, these schedules are of little value where the corporation's dividend policy cannot be decided upon until after it has set aside the reserves it desires and has ascertained the tax that will have to be paid.

The same fallacious assumption regarding the undistributed net income is made in example no. 3. It also oversimplifies the computations. It is a case where the corporation has $20,000 net income, and therefore comes under schedule III. In example no. 3 it is assumed that the corporation wishes to retain $2,000 in surplus. The report of the majority states:

The percentage of undistributed net income to adjusted net income is, therefore, 10 percent.

This is merely an assumption, and is not worked out in accordance with schedule III, which provides as follows:

If the adjusted net income is more than $10,000 and less than $40,000, the tax shall be computed by adding:

(A) A tax computed under schedule I: For such purpose the percentage which the undistributed net income is of the adjusted net income shall be ascertained by subtracting from the adjusted net income the dividend credit and a tax determined under schedule II or II–a; and

(B) A tax upon the amount of the adjusted net income in excess of $10,000 at the rate which would be applied if the tax upon the entire adjusted net income were being computed under schedule II: For such purpose the percentage which the undistributed net income is of the adjusted net income shall be ascertained by subtracting from the adjusted net income the dividend credit and a tax determined under schedule II or II–a.

Example 3 completely ignores the definition of undistributed net income set forth in this schedule, which is applicable to all cases where the net income is between $10,000 and $40,000. Under paragraph (A) of schedule III, it will be noted that for the purpose of computing the tax under schedule I the percentage which the undistributed net income is of the adjusted net income is to be ascertained by subtracting from the adjusted net income the dividend credit and the tax determined under schedule II or II–a. The same provision is made in paragraph (B) with respect to the calculation made under its specific terms. These computations are not made in example 3 of the majority's report, and the reason is quite obvious. To have done so would have shown up the bewildering complexities of the bill even more.

All the examples given in the majority's report are deliberately oversimplified and do not follow the specific terms of the bill. Hence they are misleading, and the application of the methods therein used will result in erroneous computations in other cases.

There has been much joking and criticism of the complexities of the present law, but apparently we have heretofore only scratched the surface. For the first time in history, we have tax rates that run into nine decimal places. Under schedule II–a, for example, if a taxpayer's dividend credit equals 87 percent of his adjusted net income, his tax is 3.71428571 percent, which he must apply to a net income, say, of $41,267.43. More than likely the ratio of dividends to net income will be something like 84.42163167, and then he will have to find the rate of tax himself by following one of the interpolative formulas. I quote the applicable formula from page 23 of the bill:

> If the dividend credit is a percentage of the adjusted net income, which is more than 71 and less than 86 (and such percentage is not shown in the foregoing table), the tax shall be a percentage of the adjusted net income equal to the sum of 4, plus one-third of the amount by which 86 exceeds the percentage which the dividend credit is of the adjusted net income.

The complex provisions of the proposed statute will cause more mistakes to be made in making out corporate tax returns than all prior acts put together. It will truly be a "trap for the unwary" and penalize the poorly advised. It will cause endless confusion and bewilderment and in the end fall of its own weight. So much, then, for "simplification."

Now, I would like to make just one or two other comments in my remaining time, which is short. If the bill had been a little more simple I would have had a lot more time to discuss it. I have a few remarks, however, I want to make in reference to some of the statements made by my other associates on the committee, particularly the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. He started out, it will be recalled, when he opened the debate on the bill by stating that the proposed tax would provide a "more equitable system of taxation" and added that it was based upon the principle of "ability to pay."

Of course that is as ridiculous a statement as the one made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] when he spoke about simplicity. There is no equality in the bill, and the principle of ability to pay is ignored entirely. How can there be equality, when as between two corporations with identically the same income one may pay a tax as high as 42½ percent under the bill, and the other may go scot free? That is a question perhaps he can answer, but I cannot.

Where does the principle of ability to pay come in when a corporation with a $1,000,000 income, which has a large existing reserve, is allowed to escape the proposed tax entirely by distributing its earnings, while a small company with a $10,000 income must pay a tax of 29½ percent because as a matter of good business judgment it must withhold all of its earnings from its stockholders.

Or compare the large, well-financed corporation with the small corporation burdened with debt. The big company can avoid the tax entirely by paying its current earnings to stockholders, but the debt-burdened corporation, which by all standards of fairness and equity has the least tax-paying ability, is forced to contribute 22½ percent of its earnings. And yet the gentleman from North Carolina dares to get up on this floor and without cracking a smile say that this unjust and arbitrary tax is based upon the principle of ability to pay.

The gentleman from North Carolina contended in his remarks the other day that the present law discriminated against stockholders with small incomes. It seems to me I recall the President having said something about this in his message, about the present law dipping too deeply into the shares of corporate earnings going to stockholders "who need the disbursement of dividends." I wonder if either of these distinguished gentlemen have ever taken the trouble to determine just how much the proposed tax may take out of the share of the small stockholder before he receives his dividend.

Under the present law, of course, corporations are taxed from 12½ to 15 percent on their net income, but when a dividend is declared to the stockholders it is not subject to the normal income tax but only to the surtax. Under the measure proposed by the President and so earnestly sponsored by the gentleman from North Carolina, this same small stockholder may have his proportionate share of the corporation's earnings reduced by as much as 42½ percent, and his share of the remaining 57½ percent of the earnings, when later distributed in dividends, will be subject to a further tax of 4 percent in his own hands. That is what this bill does for the small stockholder. If this small stockholder has shares in a debt-burdened company, his share of the earnings may be reduced by 22½ percent plus the 4-percent normal tax when later distributed.

I want to quote another remarkable statement of the chairman of the committee. In concluding his remarks the other day he said:

> I say you cannot challenge the statement truthfully and successfully that this bill is based upon fundamental justice and that any burdens imposed by this law will be placed where they impose the least hardship.

I very emphatically challenge that statement, Mr. Chairman. There is no justice in a bill that oppresses the weak and favors the strong, which confers a benefit of tax exemption on the large and oppresses the small. I cannot see how the burdens imposed by the bill are placed where they impose the least hardship when the corporation burdened with debt is forced to pay a tax of 22½ percent or more and the corporation with adequate reserves is enabled to go tax-free. I cannot imagine what the gentleman from North Carolina is thinking about when he makes such statements as he had made concerning this unjust and unsound bill. He is simply demonstrating that he does not know anything about it, because if he did he would not make such statements. Certainly he can see these facts as I have presented them, and I defy anyone to challenge them.

The oppressive character of the rate structure of the bill is hidden in the manner the tax is applied. Where the entire net income is distributed to stockholders no tax is imposed. If that is to be the case, then it would seem that any part of the net income which was distributed should also be tax free. But it is not. Let us consider, for a moment, the rates in schedule II. If a corporation with $100,000 income retains $10,000, 10 percent of its earnings, it is taxed 4 percent on the whole $100,000, or $4,000, which is in fact 40 percent of the amount retained. Thus we see that the 4-percent rate is in fact a 40-percent rate. If this same corporation desires to retain $10,000 more, its tax will be $9,000, which means that it pays $5,000 additional to retain an additional $10,000. If it retains $30,000, its tax will be $15,000, or 50 percent of the amount reserved, and it will have paid an additional $6,000 in tax to retain an additional $10,000 of reserve. If it retains $40,000, the tax will be $25,000, and it will have paid an additional $10,000 in tax to retain an additional $10,000 in reserve, or dollar for dollar. The $25,000 tax is 62½ percent of the amount retained. In no case can the corporation retain more than $57,500, because the tax on $42,500 will consume the balance of the income. Hence it is idle to talk about a 100-percent retention. This 42½-percent tax on a $57,500 reserve is equivalent to a rate of approximately 77 percent.

It has been said that a corporation with $10,000 net income can retain up to 40 percent of its earnings without paying any more than it does at present, while a corporation with larger earnings can retain up to 30 percent without paying more tax than now. This is not true if the stockholder is taken into consideration, because he will be subject to the 4-percent normal tax which he does not now pay.

This brings to mind another remarkable statement made by the gentleman from North Carolina which I desire to challenge. In his remarks the other day he said:

> There is no intention or desire whatever to interfere with the internal management of business enterprises. The object of this revenue measure is not to tell corporate managements what proportion they shall retain.

Now, that is a very naive statement. It is not original with the gentleman but was taken, word for word, from the statement of Commissioner Helvering before the committee, as found on page 22 of the hearings. Of course, there is no intention not to interfere with the internal management of business enterprises—not much! There is no intention to compel a corporation to distribute its earnings, yet coercive taxes are imposed to bring that result about. There is no intention of telling a corporation how much reserve it can build up, but if it has an income of more than $40,000 the most it can possibly retain is 57½ percent, because the 42½-percent tax will take the balance. There is no intention to influence a corporation's dividend policy, but if it declares out all of its earnings it is rewarded by complete tax exemption. I am surprised that intelligent gentlemen would get up here on this floor and seriously state that this bill does not interfere with corporate management.

What is a corporation going to do when it comes to deciding its dividend and reserve policies? The decision of its board of directors, which should be controlled solely by sound business judgment, will be influenced and largely determined by the tax imposed by this bill. The bill holds out a seductive inducement to improvident management and it penalizes prudent management. At the same time, by allowing well-financed corporations complete tax exemption, it will induce their smaller competitors to follow a loose fiscal policy in order to minimize their tax so as to be able to compete on equal terms. This will lead the small companies into bankruptcy and give the larger companies a monopoly.

I need hardly stress the importance and necessity of adequate reserves to business institutions and their employees. They bear the same relation to a corporation as a savings account bears to an individual. They have been called the "life insurance policies of business." The value of reserves as a stabilizing factor has been ampy demonstrated during the depression.

The earnings which wise and prudent corporations put aside in good times to carry them over hard times enabled thousands of businesses to continue which otherwise would have failed. They enabled millions of employees to be retained at their jobs who otherwise would have been without work. They enabled stockholders to receive a steady income when they needed it most. We can be thankful that the tax scheme now proposed was not in effect during the prosperous days, because it would have forced or induced business institutions to pay out their earnings and they would have had nothing left for the "rainy days" that were to come.

The contribution made by business from these reserves for recovery and relief purposes was tremendous. The Department of Commerce estimates that in the 5-year period from 1930 to 1934, inclusive, income paid out in the United States exceeded income earned by nearly $27,000,000,000, which is several times what was spent by the Federal Government in the same period.

We have heard a great deal from the present occupant of the White House about economic stability, social security, and so forth. This measure runs at cross purposes with these objectives, because by discouraging providence and thrift it will accentuate the peaks of boom times and increase the adversity of hard times. By the same token, it will make the Federal revenues more unstable.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] stated that the proposed tax "provides a basis for an excellent and productive permanent revenue measure." Does he not know that one of the prime requisites of a sound tax, aside from equity and fairness in its application, is stability of revenue. The income tax is already unstable, since we only collect the tax when the taxpayer, individual or corporate, has income. This measure would make the tax revenues more unstable, since we would collect more in prosperous times and there would be less income to tax in hard times.

One of the most objectionable features of the proposed tax is that it oppresses corporations with debts, while lifting the tax load from financially strong companies. If there is any justification for making a corporation pay taxes in proportion to the amount of debts it owes, I am afraid I cannot understand it. The bill professes to tax income, but it does not do so. It taxes thrift and prudence, as I have already pointed out, and it also taxes hard luck.

The so-called relief provisions for debtor corporations are a colossal and cruel joke. Corporations with debts existing prior to March 3, 1936, are "relieved" by being permitted to pay 22½ percent, which is from 7½ to 10 percent more than the present tax rate. "R-e-l-i-e-v-e" is the proper word, not "r-e-l-i-e-f." In any event, this so-called relief is only applicable where the debt has been in existence prior to March 3, 1936.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK] pointed out that if a corporation borrowed $50,000 from a bank today and at the end of the year earned $50,000, which it used to repay the debt, the Government would collect a tax of 42½ percent, which would mean that the corporation would have to borrow another $21,250 to pay the tax. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER], who spoke following the gentleman from Ohio, challenged that statement of facts, but did not show wherein it was wrong. The gentleman from Ohio is absolutely right. Under the facts stated the corporation would be taxed $21,250 because it earned $50,000 and paid no dividends. The so-called relief provisions would not apply because the debt was contracted after March 3, 1936, and even if they did apply the corporation would still have to borrow $11,250 to pay the tax.

The President has asked business to take up the unemployment slack, but under this bill he penalizes business for using its earnings for expansion or rehabilitation purposes. Let a business go out and try to borrow money from a bank for that purpose. It cannot do so, especially if it is a small business without substantial financial backing. The only way small businesses can grow is by reinvesting their earnings, which they are now permitted to do after paying the regular corporation income tax of 12½ to 15 percent. This bill would tax them up to 42½ percent. Take a particular case. Here is a corporation which earns $50,000. It desires to use the earnings for plant extensions, which would enable it to employ more men. If it retains the whole $50,000, it is taxed $21,250, which means that it only has $28,750 left for that purpose.

By penalizing the growth of small concerns the bill plays directly into the hands of the large corporations and increases their stranglehold on business. It is the successor to the N. R. A. as a monopoly breeder.

Mr. Chairman, I have served on the Ways and Means Committee a good many years. I am very proud of my associates on that committee. I am only sorry for the present majority members that they have to take orders to do such ridiculous things as are contained within the pages of this bill.

I could elaborate upon these ridiculous features indefinitely, but I am conscious of the fact that no amount of facts or logic could sway the 3-to-1 Democratic majority from their subserviency in supporting this vicious and unsound legislation. In all my experience here I have never known a bill as unfair, as inequitable, as unreasonable, and as impossible of enforcement as this measure now before us, and it ought to have a unanimous vote of this House against it.

The Democratic majority dislike the appellation "rubber stamps" which has been so fittingly applied to them. They continually disclaim the fact that they are "rubber stamps." This bill furnishes them a good opportunity to prove whether or not they are capable of exercising their own minds or are simply so many sheep, blindly following their leader, even when he leads them over a precipice. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time on this side to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DUNCAN].

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not presume any Member of Congress or any committee ever supported a tax bill because they desired to do so. They are usually matters of necessity. There are always two things to be borne in mind, it seems to me, when we are considering tax legislation. One, of course, is the amount of money to be raised and the other is the source from which it shall come, a source that will do the least damage to the economic structure of the country.

In the drafting of this tax bill these have been the things that have been in the minds of the members of the committee and, I am sure, are in the minds of the Members of this House.

There is a third consideration that ought always to be considered, and that is the social effect it may have upon the country. The gentleman from Ohio mentioned this yesterday, and I think the people of this country during the past year have come to a realization that there must be some way to control, in a measure, the economic conditions that we face.

You know I have been somewhat amused by my friend from Massachusetts, who just spoke. I have a very, very high regard for him. It seemed strange to me when I picked up the paper this morning and saw in the headlines that the G. O. P. had met last night and formed a block to oppose the tax bill. I read the minority report of the committee a few days ago and it seemed to me that I, as ignorant as I may be about some things, could glean from it that the Republicans in this House were then opposed to the tax bill. You know their masters came to town yesterday, and I wonder if that had anything to do with the meeting last night. The United States Chamber of Commerce convened in the city of Washington yesterday, and strange as it may seem, the minority of this House, after having spent 3 days in attacks upon this bill on the floor of the House, had a meeting last night to form a block to oppose the legislation. I wonder if they wanted the news to go out to the country that they had convened here and had called their few members together to let the country know that they were loyal to the few people who are now supporting the minority in this House. There are not very many such supporters left, and, oh, when they convened yesterday, the first speech that was made was a bitter, vicious attack upon the President of the United States and upon his policies, and they asked the laboring people of this country to join the United States Chamber of Commerce to destroy the New Deal. My God, the only square deal that labor has ever had within my memory has been during the past 3 years or during the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt. [Applause.]

These are the gentlemen who would have labor join them. Oh, there are still a lot of apostles of greed among these gentlemen, and I am not surprised that my friend from Massachusetts does not want to understand this bill or that he cannot understand it. You know men think in accordance with their environment in life and, fortunately, this tax bill is a tax bill of the people and it has not been written by the gentlemen who are going to pay the tax, as so many tax bills in the past have been written. They have not had much voice in it and some gentlemen have been thinking in terms of ultraconservatism ever since they came from the cradle, and they cannot understand any kind or character of legislation that is not the result of their own brain or of their own opinion or legislation that is written by the interests they serve.

This bill has been pretty well explained as to its details by those who are more familiar with it than I am.

The gentleman from Ohio stated yesterday that this measure would aid the chain stores. How have the chain stores been able to expand? It has been through their large purchasing power, using other people's money, and with the discounts and rebates they get they have been able to make large sums of money and then they have used their surpluses to expand all over the country. They are using other people's money to do it.

People who are opposing this bill today have enjoyed their business success at the cost of using other people's money and paying a small return on it.

They have been telling us that this will destroy surpluses, that it will destroy business, that it will destroy purchasing power, and increase the unemployment in the country. A gentleman sat across my desk not a month ago, a gentleman from my own State, who is at the head of one of the biggest businesses in that State, and we were discussing the general unemployment situation. It was a few days after the President of the United States had made his speech in which he had called upon the industry of this country to assume its responsibility in the elimination of unemployment. He sat across my desk and said to me that the business interests of this country are not going to attempt to assume to take over the unemployment situation or to relieve such conditions so long as Congress and this administration are interfering with their business.

This is the policy of business all over this country. So long as they can go their own way, unhampered by any legal regulations; can do as they please not only with their own money but with other people's money; and so long as they can do this they are willing to go along, but unless they can make the rules of the game, they will not play.

Mr. Chairman, I believe firmly that we are never going back to the old order of things. I do not class myself as a radical in any sense of the word, but I like to look at things as they are, and the legislator or the businessman who believes we are going back to the old order of things will be sitting at his desk with cobwebs wound about his head when Gabriel blows his horn for judgment day. We are living in a new age, and we must face it under new and completely changed economic conditions.

You know there is an old Slavic adage, "The impossibility of yesterday is the commonplace of tomorrow." Someone has stated that this bill is new. We are facing new conditions that have to be met. The gentleman from Massachusetts said he could not understand it and did not want to understand it. It seems to me, and I am going to make the prediction—I may be wrong, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER] said he might be—but it seems to me the principles of this bill will result in an expansion of industry, and in more employment.

We read in the papers every day that many kinds of industry are back to almost the normal conditions, or the condition they were in 1929. There is not a man or woman in the House today who knows what normalcy is under present conditions. Much of our industry has recovered, but we know that employment is lagging and that rates of pay have lagged and are not keeping pace with industrial recovery.

Business is endeavoring to recover its losses. That is human nature, but when times began to get better industry everywhere had one thought, and that was let us get back the profits that we have lost. Industry is manufacturing more commodities, selling more commodities, but it is not employing people and not paying wages in accordance with its increased business and profits.

Therefore they are getting back the profits, they are expanding the business at the expense of the men who create it.

It seems to me that a bill or a law of this kind will aid employment.

A man asked me the other day about these reserves. He said, "I have been losing several hundred dollars a week and several thousand dollars a month—I had a reserve of $100,000 and it is nearly gone."

I said, "How long did it take you to accumulate that reserve?" He said, "About 30 years"—and that is true in nearly all the businesses we have been talking about—it has taken a number of years to accumulate the reserve.

My friends, let me say this to you on the left side of the House: If the people of this country will—and I know they are going to—continue the policy of this New Deal and never go back, we will never have any more depressions in this country, because we are going to meet conditions as they are. [Applause.]

You will not need those big reserves. It has taken years and years to build them up, and they will continue to do so under the provisions of this act, but such earnings also will pay a just tax. Somebody here the other day said this bill would result in placing large sums of money in tax-exempt securities. Under the Social Securities bill which we passed last year, in the course of a few years there will be approximately $13,000,000,000 in the old-age annuity fund, and in a period of 20 years there will be $18,000,000,000 in that fund. There will not be any more Government bonds in the hands of individuals or in banks, because the Government will finance its borrowing obligations out of that old-age annuity fund, and that money now in tax-exempt securities will go into the channels of legitimate commerce and get back to paying legitimate taxes in the community in which you and I live.

This bill will place the earnings of business in the hands of the people to whom it belongs. It will increase, following the natural order of things, the demand for securities, the demand for stocks and bonds. I believe it is true that the majority of the people in this country buy industrial stocks for investment purposes, and if they know they are going to be paid the interest their money earns, is it not natural that they will buy those bonds and stocks and that there will be more demand, which will result in industrial expansion and in fairness to the people whose money has made this country what it is today?

Those who want to understand the bill can understand it. It has been given a lot of thought. Of course, gentlemen on the minority side from the very beginning were opposed to any sort of legislation. The statement was made here yesterday by some gentleman, that he opposed it because he did not know how the money it raises was going to be expended. It so happens that I am from one of the great agricultural parts of this country. This money, as you know, is being raised to carry on the agricultural program, to meet the obligation that the Government created under the old agriculture program, and whatever may have been the result, whatever may have been the constitutionality of the old agriculture program, it saved agriculture in this country from national bankruptcy. There is no question in the mind of any man or woman in this House today about that, if they will just be fair with themselves. This new program is going to come out equally well. You know that 100,000,000 acres of land in the United States have been absolutely abandoned, and are unfit for further agricultural purposes. That is an area equal to the size of the States of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Virginia, and North and South Carolina. The land is completely destroyed, and can never be brought back and made of any value for agricultural purposes. There is another 100,000,000 acres almost ready to be discarded for agricultural purposes. That is a destruction of the national wealth of this country. This bill will help to restore some of that. It will help to save that just on the border line. I do not think there has been a tax bill before this House to raise money which is to be used for a more worthy purpose than this.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNCAN. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. My friend has referred during his remarks to the result of the leadership of the present administration. I have in my hand a copy of the New York Times of this morning showing the returns for last year and in some cases for the first quarter of this year of about 30 corporations. Twenty-five of those corporations show substantial increases. They are domestic corporations. Only four show a loss. I also call attention of the gentleman to the headline in the New York Times of this morning, "Credits Roosevelt with trade gain." This is a quotation from a speech made by Thomas J. Watson, president of the International Business Machines Co., at a dinner given by the American section of the International Chamber of Commerce, of which he is the chairman. Mr. Watson gave full credit to the Roosevelt administration for its contribution toward the complete restoration of economic recovery in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. DUNCAN. Oh, I think the people of this country know who is responsible for economic recovery.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNCAN. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman just referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] is at the head of a committee of the International Chamber of Commerce, not the National Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. McCORMACK. I did not say that he was the head of the National Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. MICHENER. I just wanted to call attention to the fact that he thinks internationally.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman does not have to call attention to anything. I said the International Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNCAN. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman will also admit that while business recovery has gained about 16 percent the stock market has increased almost 50 percent.

Mr. DUNCAN. That is correct. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill by sections.

The Clerk read as follows:

SCHEDULE I—ADJUSTED NET INCOME OF $10,000 OR LESS BASED ON UNDISTRIBUTED NET INCOME

If the undistributed net income equals a percentage of the adjusted net income shown in column 1 of the following table, then the tax shall be the percentage of the adjusted net income shown opposite in column 2.

If the undistributed net income is a percentage of the adjusted net income which is less than 10 (and such percentage is not shown in the foregoing table) the tax shall be a percentage of the adjusted net income equal to one-tenth of the percentage which the undistributed net income is of the adjusted net income.

If the undistributed net income is a percentage of the adjusted net income which is more than 10 and less than 20 (and such percentage is not shown in the foregoing table) the tax shall be a percentage of the adjusted net income equal to the sum of 1, plus one-fourth of the amount by which the percentage which the undistributed net income is of the adjusted net income exceeds 10.

If the undistributed net income is a percentage of the adjusted net income which is more than 20 and less than 30 (and such percentage is not shown in the foregoing table) the tax shall be a percentage of the adjusted net income equal to the sum of 3.5, plus four-tenths of the amount by which the percentage which the undistributed net income is of the adjusted net income exceeds 20.

If the undistributed net income is a percentage of the adjusted net income which is more than 30 (and such percentage is not shown in the foregoing table) the tax shall be a percentage of the adjusted net income equal to the sum of 7.5, plus fifty-five one-hundredths of the amount by which the percentage which the undistributed net income is of the adjusted net income exceeds 30.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I shall not make any extended remarks on this bill, but I wish to offer a few observations. I shall vote against it—

First, because it will not even begin to raise the revenue required to balance the Budget. Deficits are approximating $4,000,000,000 a year, and the most optimistic supporters of this measure do not claim that it will yield more than one-fifth of that amount.

There is no use trying to conceal from the American people any longer that those who dance must pay the fiddler. An administration that spends twice as much as it collects must face the reality that if it does not double taxes it will go broke.

Senator LA FOLLETTE had the right idea last year; he has the right idea today—broaden the base, lower the exemptions, and increase both normal and surtax rates. Do this or cut expenditures in two. That is arithmetic, and arithmetic never lies.

Second. I shall vote against this bill because I do not wish to be a party to deceiving the American people. This measure is a fraud. It purports to hit the big corporations, but it hits the small ones. The big corporations have enormous reserves, which this bill will not touch. They can distribute all their earnings and thereby get away from paying any income tax at all. Today they pay from 12½ to 15 percent. Under this bill they will pay nothing. On the other hand, the small and weak corporations, whose reserves have been wiped out by 6 years of depression, whose plants are run down and worn out, which must reserve all their earnings to stay in business, will be required to pay at rates running as high as 42½ percent. A tax thus discriminating against the weak corporation and in favor of the strong one violates the most fundamental of all principles of taxation, that taxes should be in proportion to ability to pay.

Third. I shall vote against this bill because it will put a brake on recovery in the heavy industries. In periods of depression it is the heavy industries that suffer most and longest. The demand for consumers' goods diminishes, but the diminution, except in luxury lines, is comparatively small. Recovery in consumers' goods industries comes first. It is the heavy industries that lag. It is in the heavy industries that the most serious unemployment situation exists today. Carpenters, bricklayers, stonemasons, painters, and workers in concrete and structural steel are on the dole. Steel and cement plants, iron and copper mines, lumber and linseed-oil mills stand with smokeless chimneys because the heavy industries are stagnant. There will be no substantial recovery in the heavy industries unless and until corporations begin to replace or expand their physical plants, and there will be few corporations whose officers and directors will consent to do so if the cost is increased 42½ percent by the imposition of a 42½-percent tax on reserved earnings.

If the administration is interested in recovery in the heavy industries, its leaders in Congress should exempt from the proposed tax, earnings used for plant improvement.

Fourth. I shall vote against this bill because it will prevent liquidation of corporate debts, force many concerns into bankruptcy, and impair the value of corporate securities held by millions of American investors. The present tax is high enough on that part of a corporation's earnings that is used for the liquidation of obligations. It is sound Government policy to encourage debt retirement. There are too many corporations in this country with an overloaded capital structure. First earnings must be made to cover fixed charges; then further earnings must be made, if possible, for dividends on stock. Dividends may lapse, but interest payments must not be suspended, else the company suffers bankruptcy. Consequently the usual effort is to charge the consumer all the traffic will bear in order to keep the business going. One of the principal reasons for excessive prices is the pressure exerted by corporate debts. This bill in effect increases corporate debts to the extent that the rate on earnings reserved for debt retirement exceeds the present corporate income-tax rate.

Fifth. I shall vote against this bill because it will inevitably lead to monopoly. As I have already indicated, the big corporation, with ample reserves already created, will pay no income tax under the present measure. It does not need to take income-tax payments into consideration in fixing the prices of its products. Its weak competitor, faced with the need of building reserves, will have to charge a price high enough to absorb a tax of up to 42½ percent. A corporation without debt pays no tax. One with debt pays a tax of 22½ percent on the part of its earnings reserved for debt retirement and must charge enough to enable it to pay that tax. Modern business is highly competitive. The seller who can shave the last dollar off the price gets the order. The company that does not get orders goes out of business. The most serious result of this legislation will be to eliminate the smaller and weaker concerns and to leave a few of the big ones in undisputed possession of American business and industry.

I hold no brief for corporations and do not dispute the contention that, with Government budgets increasing, they must pay higher taxes than they do today. Therefore I shall vote for an amendment which will be offered that will increase the present corporation income tax drastically; that will, in fact, exact as much money as the bill now before us, but exact it in such a way that it will be possible for the little fellow to continue to do business alongside his big competitor.

While doing so, I shall hope that in another year saner policies will prevail in this country, and that economy will cease to be merely a word with which to catch votes and become again an expression of the dominant purpose of the Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHRISTIANSON] has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. ACCUMULATED EARNINGS AND PROFITS LESS THAN ADJUSTED NET INCOME.

(a) General rule: If the accumulated earnings and profits of the corporation as of the close of the taxable year (computed without diminution by reason of the distribution during the taxable year of earnings and profits, or by reason of the taxes imposed by this title for the taxable year) are less than the adjusted net income, the tax imposed by section 13 shall, in lieu of being computed under section 13, be computed by adding:

(1) A tax of 22½ percent of the excess of the adjusted net income over such accumulated earnings and profits; and

(2) A tax upon the remainder of the adjusted net income (less the tax under paragraph (1)) computed under section 13 as if the adjusted net income were equal to the amount of such remainder so reduced.

(b) Tax not to be increased: This section shall not be applied in any case in which such application would operate to increase the tax which would be payable without its application.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Committee amendment offered by Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL: On page 24, line 11, strike out "22½ percent" and insert "15 percent."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

SEC. 15. CONTRACTS NOT TO PAY DIVIDENDS.

(a) General rule: If under a written contract executed by the corporation prior to March 3, 1936, there is no form in which dividends equal to the adjusted net income for the taxable year may be paid during the dividend year without violating a provision of such contract expressly dealing with the payment of dividends, the tax imposed by section 13 shall, in lieu of being computed under such section, be computed by adding:

(1) A tax of 22½ percent of the excess of the adjusted net income over the amount which is not prohibited during the whole of the dividend year from being paid as dividends during the dividend year; and

(2) A tax upon the remainder of the adjusted net income (less the tax under paragraph (1)) computed under section 13 as if the adjusted net income were equal to the amount of such remainder so reduced.

(b) Tax not to be increased: This section shall not be applied in any case in which such application would operate to increase the tax which would be payable without its application.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman explain the purpose of that amendment?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The purpose of the amendment is to amend the text of the bill which provides a different dividend year from the taxable year.

Mr. KVALE. Is the dividend year the calendar year and is the taxable year the fiscal year, or what is the distinction?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The taxable year is ordinarily the calendar year, but not always. Sometimes it is the fiscal year; but we put in this bill a definition of the dividend year, which begins 2½ months after the beginning of the taxable year and extends 2½ months beyond the end of the taxable year. We want to make the dividend year coincide with the taxable year, and that is all this amendment does.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL].

The amendments were agreed to.

SEC. 27. CORPORATION CREDIT FOR DIVIDENDS PAID.

(a) Definition of "dividend year": The term "dividend year", when used in this title with reference to a corporation, means the period beginning on the 15th day of the third month after the day before the beginning of the taxable year (whether the taxable year is a period of 12 months or a shorter period) and ending on the 14th day of the third month after the close of the taxable year.

(b) Dividend credit in general: For the purposes of this title, the dividend credit shall be the amount of dividends paid during the dividend year corresponding to the taxable year.

(c) Dividend carry-over: In computing the dividend credit for any taxable year, if the dividends paid during the dividend year are less than the adjusted net income, there shall be allowed as part of the dividend credit, and in the following order:

(1) Dividends paid during the second preceding dividend year in excess of the adjusted net income for the corresponding taxable year, to the extent not needed as a dividend credit for the taxable year preceding the taxable year the tax for which is being computed; and

In the case of a taxable year the tax for which has been or is being computed under section 14 or 15 the term "adjusted net income" as used in this subsection means the amount subject to tax under subsection (a) (2) of such section; and in case of a taxable year the tax for which has been or is being computed under section 16 the term "adjusted net income" as used in this subsection means the amount subject to tax under subsection (b) (2) of such section. No credit shall be allowed for dividends paid by a corporation prior to the 15th day of the third month of its first taxable year under this title.

(d) Dividends in kind: If a dividend is paid in property other than money (including stock of the corporation if held by the corporation as an investment) the dividend credit with respect thereto shall be the adjusted basis of the property in the hands of the corporation at the time of the payment, or the fair market value of the property at the time of the payment, whichever is the lower.

(e) Dividends in obligations of the corporation: If a dividend is paid in obligations of the corporation, the amount of the dividend credit with respect thereto shall be the face value of the obligations, or their fair market value at the time of the payment, whichever is the lower. If the fair market value is lower than the face value, then when the obligation is redeemed by the corporation, the excess of the amount for which redeemed over the fair market value at the time of the dividend payment (to the extent not allowable as a deduction in computing net income for any taxable year) shall be treated as a dividend paid in the dividend year in which the redemption occurs.

(f) Taxable stock dividends: In case of a stock dividend or stock right which is a taxable dividend in the hands of shareholders under section 115 (f), the dividend credit with respect thereto shall be the fair market value of the stock or the stock right at the time of the payment.

(g) Distributions in liquidation: In the case of amounts distributed in liquidation the part of such distribution which is properly chargeable to the earnings or profits accumulated after February 28, 1913, shall, for the purposes of computing the dividend credit under this section, be treated as a taxable dividend paid.

(h) Preferential dividends: No dividend credit shall be allowed with respect to any distribution unless the distribution is pro rata, equal in amount, and with no preference to any share of stock as compared with other shares of the same class, and each of the shareholders of that class, who are subject to taxation under this title for the period in which the distribution is made, receives a taxable dividend as a result of the distribution.

(i) Nontaxable distributions: If any part of a distribution (including stock dividends and stock rights) is not a taxable dividend in the hands of such of the shareholders as are subject to taxation under this title for the period in which the distribution is made, no dividend credit shall be allowed with respect to such part.

(j) Intercorporate dividends: If 80 percent or more of the gross income of the corporation is derived from dividends, then the dividend credit with respect to each dividend payment shall be reduced to an amount equal to the sum of:

(1) The portion of such dividend payment paid to shareholders other than corporations;

(2) The portion of such dividend payment paid to corporations taxable under section 104, 105, 201, 204, 207, 231, 251, or 261, or to corporations exempt from taxation under section 101;

(3) The portion of such dividend payment made to a corporate shareholder owning less than 50 percent of the class of stock with respect to which the dividend is paid; and

(4) An amount of such dividend payment paid to other corporate shareholders which bears the same ratio to the total dividend payment paid to them as the part of the gross income not derived from dividends bears to the entire gross income.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer committee amendments.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, these amendments supplement the previous amendments offered and adopted in committee, making the dividend year correspond with the taxable year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take any time. There have been several inquiries made with reference to this entire section—section 27. So far as I know it has not been definitely explained in the House by any member of the committee, and I think a little time might well be devoted to debating it or explaining it, particularly subsection (j), on page 51, the 80-percent provision. I should appreciate it if some member of the committee on the majority side would explain it.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes, Mr. Chairman; I yield the floor.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, subdivision (j) of section 27 of the bill refers to intercorporate dividends, refers to dividend credit for intercorporate dividends. Subdivision (j) of section 27 reads:

If 80 percent or more of the gross income of the corporation is derived from dividends, then the dividend credit with respect to each dividend payment shall be reduced to an amount equal to the sum of.

Then follows a number of subsections showing to what amount the sum is reduced.

No. 1 provides that it shall be reduced to "the portion of such dividend payment paid to shareholders other than corporations."

I take it this needs no explanation:

Subdivision 2: The portion of such dividend payment paid to corporations taxable under sections 104, 105, 201, 204, 207, 231, 251, or 261, or to corporations exempt from taxation under section 101.

Section 104 refers to banks and trust companies. Section 105 refers to corporations in receivership. Section 201 refers to life-insurance companies. Section 204 refers to insurance companies other than life. Section 207 refers to mutual insurance companies other than life. Section 251 refers to corporations within the possessions of the United States; and section 261 refers to the China Trade Act. These companies receive special treatment and dividends paid to these corporations entitle the paying corporation to full dividend credit.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The corporations enumerated by the gentleman might be classified as the 15-percent rate corporations.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. They are all under the 15-percent rate. They are the ones excepted from the general plan of taxation under this bill.

Subdivision 3 reads:

> The portion of such dividend payment made to a corporate shareholder owning less than 50 percent of the class of stock with respect to which the dividend is paid.

This means that dividends paid by a corporation to a corporation stockholder holding less than 50 percent of the paying corporation stock entitles the paying corporation to full dividend credit for the amount so paid.

Subdivision 4 reads:

> An amount of such dividend payment paid to other corporate shareholders which bears the same ratio to the total dividend payment paid to them as the part of the gross income not derived from dividends bears to the entire gross income.

I think we can best illustrate this section by giving an example: Corporation A is an operating company; its stock is held by corporation B. Corporation B is a holding company. Fifty percent or more of the stock of corporation B is held by corporation C. Corporation B, for the purpose of this illustration, receives 80 percent or more of its income from dividends. The question is, What dividend credit shall corporation B have on the payment of its dividends to corporation C, which holds 50 percent or more of the stock of corporation B?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The fourth subdivision, as I recall it, refers to dividends paid representing income from other than dividend sources.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I think if the gentleman will allow me to complete my illustration it will be perfectly clear.

Corporation C holds 50 percent or more of the stock of corporation B. The question is, What dividend credit shall corporation B get for payments of dividends to corporation C? We will say that corporation B gets 80 percent of its dividends from corporation A, or other corporations, and 20 percent of its income from sources other than corporation dividends. This section means that the dividend credit it shall get upon payment of dividends to corporation C shall be in the proportion of 20 to 80; in other words, it gets 20 percent of its income from sources other than corporation dividends, and it is entitled to a dividend credit on this proportion of its income when it makes a dividend payment to corporation C.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask the gentleman one question? I think he has covered subdivision (j) very thoroughly. Now, referring to section (f), taxable stock dividends, which is, of course, entirely new, that is, the principle is entirely new in that there is a set-up there under which stock dividends can be taxed, which has not been in the previous law. I am correct in that?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit, under the 1934 act there was a provision that said no stock dividend should be taxed. In a very celebrated case, Eisner against Macomber, the Supreme Court held that the tax dividend involved in that case was not taxable. Out of that case grew up the idea that no stock dividend was taxable. I think it was because of that notion that the language to which I have referred, as appears in the 1934 bill, found its way there; that is, that no stock dividend should be taxed.

The proposed plan does not change the law and does not in the slightest degree strike at the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Eisner and Macomber in respect of a stock dividend where there is no change in the proportion of ownership by the shareholder.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The case of Eisner against Macomber, as I recall, involved a corporation with $1,000,000 common stock. There was a declaration of a $500,000 stock dividend to the common-share holders. The Court held, and I think correctly, that where each shareholder got his proportionate part of the new stock there was no change in his ownership in the corporation. That, in a corporation with a million-dollar capital, the distribution of another half million to the holders of the common stock made no change in ownership. The shareholder who owned a share of stock would own one and a half shares in the increased structure, and therefore there was no change in the ownership so far as he and the corporation were concerned.

It has been evidenced throughout the years that there are innumerable stock dividends that are taxable. The issuance of stock, either common or preferred, or bonds, in payment of dividends may change the proportion of ownership among the shareholders. For instance, let us take this illustration: You issue preferred stockholders common stock to satisfy dividends declared to preferred stockholders. You have introduced additional common stock. It is in the hands of persons other than the present common-stock holders; consequently there is a change in the proportion of ownership in the common-stock holders.

The Supreme Court in one case laid down the rule that the yardstick in respect of the taxability of stock dividends was the character or kind of stock and the change in proportion of ownership. I submitted in the RECORD yesterday a statement prepared for me by Mr. Kent, Acting General Counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, setting forth decisions of the Supreme Court where stock dividends were held to be nontaxable; and other cases where the Supreme Court and the Board of Tax Appeals held that stock dividends were taxable. In this connection I pointed out that in the April volume of the Columbia University Law Review a gentleman, in whom we have great faith and confidence, the Honorable Roswell Magill, wrote a very comprehensive and illuminating article on the taxability of stock dividends.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three works to ask the gentleman a question.

As I recall it, in the present law there was just one line, 115, which read "stock dividends shall not be subject to tax." That is correct?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is right.

Mr. TREADWAY. It has been stricken out in this bill, and you are substituting therefor section (f), on page 107, of which the gentleman has given a history.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And further, in connection with that, there is another section which I cannot put my finger on right now.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is the one we have over here.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The section to which I refer states that the only stock dividends we seek to tax are those which are taxable income within the sixteenth amendment.

Mr. TREADWAY. The language stricken out, I may say, reads as follows:

(b) Stock dividends: A stock dividend shall not be subject to tax.

That is the existing law and has been the law most of the time since the Eisner against Macomber decision. In the next tax bill after that decision that language was included.

I understand the gentleman's explanation to be that the language of the act was too broad. I do not mean too broad in the sense it is not legal, but it goes further than the Eisner against Macomber decision.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is correct.

Mr. TREADWAY. The language now substituted for the stricken language describes new stock dividends that can be taxed or what portion of stock dividends under the sixteenth amendment can in the future be taxed. Is that the right conception of the intention?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Well, we take the broad position that stock dividends that are taxable income within the sixteenth amendment are subject to taxation, and if they are not such stock dividends and not any taxable income under the sixteenth amendment, they are not subject to taxes.

Mr. TREADWAY. The only comment I may add to the very excellent explanation which the gentleman has given is that, so far as I know, this subject matter was not taken up either by the committee or the subcommittee until this bill appeared in print and we voted it in bloc form. Am I right?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is correct, so far as the full committee is concerned, but I may say that the Democratic majority gave considerable thought to this language and to the purpose. So far as I know, there is no one who is objecting or could object to the policy that we have pursued.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The question is also involved in the determination of what shall constitute dividend credit.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; I realize that.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In other words, to that extent, of course, it might be helpful to the corporate taxpayer.

Mr. TREADWAY. Therefore the language is drawn with the view of complying with conditions under which the sixteenth amendment is applicable.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman states it in a nutshell.

Mr. TREADWAY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MCCORMACK). For what purpose does the gentleman from Wisconsin rise?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. To submit a unanimous-consent request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, because of a misunderstanding I ask unanimous consent that we be allowed to return to page 42 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to return to page 42 of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I regret it, exceedingly, but we shall have to object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The Clerk will read.

SEC. 55. PUBLICITY OF RETURNS.

(a) Returns made under this title shall be open to inspection in the same manner, to the same extent, and subject to the same provisions of law, including penalties, as returns made under title II of the Revenue Act of 1926; and all returns made under this act shall constitute public records and shall be open to public examination and inspection to such extent as shall be authorized in rules and regulations promulgated by the President.

Any officer, employee, or agent of any State or political subdivision who divulges (except as authorized in this subsection, or when called upon to testify in any judicial or administrative proceeding to which the State or political subdivision, or such State or local official, body, or commission, as such, is a party) any information acquired by him through an inspection permitted him or another under this subsection shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall upon conviction be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wisconsin rise?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. To submit a unanimous-consent request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, I now ask unanimous consent that we may return to page 42 of the bill so that I may offer a brief amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to return to page 42 of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I regret it, exceedingly, Mr. Chairman, but I shall have to object as I did a moment ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

The Clerk read to the end of line 12, page 78.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and two Members present, a quorum. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read to the end of line 8, page 93.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ten Members are present, a quorum. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(2) Substituted basis: The term "substituted basis" as used in this subsection means a basis determined under any provision of subsection (a) of this section or under any corresponding provision of a prior income-tax law, providing that the basis shall be determined—

(A) by reference to the basis in the hands of a transferor, donor, or grantor, or

(B) by reference to other property held at any time by the person for whom the basis is to be determined.

Whenever it appears that the basis of property in the hands of the taxpayer is a substituted basis, then the adjustments provided in paragraph (1) of this subsection shall be made after first making in respect of such substituted basis proper adjustments of a similar nature in respect of the period during which the property was held by the transferor, donor, or grantor, or during which the other property was held by the person for whom the basis is to be determined. A similar rule shall be applied in the case of a series of substituted bases.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. To ask unanimous consent to return to page 42 that I may offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to return to page 42 so that he may offer an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Amendment by Mr. SAUTHOFF: Page 42, after line 18, insert the following:

"(r) Pay-roll additions: In the case of an employer, an amount equal to 50 percent of the excess of the amount paid during the taxable year to his employees as compensation for personal services over the amount paid during the preceding taxable year to his employees as compensation for personal services. The deduction allowed by this subsection shall not apply with respect to any compensation paid at a rate in excess of $5,000 per annum or to any compensation paid to any individual less than 18 years of age and shall be in addition to the amounts allowable as a deduction on account of such expenses under subsection (a)."

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Ways and Means, which has had the new revenue bill of 1936 under consideration for some time, in its report sets forth the objects of the bill. The objects are:

First, to prevent avoidance of surtax by individuals through the accumulation of income by corporations.

Second, to remove serious inequities and inequalities between corporate, partnership, and individual forms of business organization.

Third, to remove the inequity as between large and small shareholders resulting from the present flat corporate rates.

With these objects I am in accord. The Progressives of Wisconsin have declared a taxation policy which adopts the basic principle that "taxation must be based upon ability to pay." We Progressives feel that various tax exemptions and tax evasions are now being accomplished through the medium of undistributed profits held by corporations and also with the well-known device of the holding company. We are also opposed to tax-exempt securities, to which I want to refer a little more fully later on. Therefore I shall vote for this tax bill, not because I believe that it will accomplish all the objectives stated in the committee report but because there is no other bill before us, and because tax measures must originate in the House and cannot originate in the Senate. Therefore, it is the only available legislation which we can support.

Is there need for additional taxes? We know that there is. The President, in his message of March 3, 1936, has clearly pointed out the necessity for additional revenue. Those of us who voted for the soldiers' bonus, the farm-aid bill, and other appropriations must now assume the responsibility of raising the money with which to pay them. This is the place where that has to be done, and I as one who voted for the bonus, farm aid, and so forth, must take the responsibility of raising the money to pay for these bills. I do not see how anyone who voted for the bonus can vote against this tax bill unless he has a better one to submit in its place. Such an alternative has not been forthcoming, and I therefore believe it will be necessary for this House to pass this tax bill. Most of us are convinced that the Senate will rewrite it.

There are some phases of the bill before us which have caused me to feel apprehensive as to the effect it will have upon unemployment, for to me unemployment is the major problem that confronts every executive and every legislator, whether State or National, in our country. If we levy too burdensome a tax upon industry, then we defeat our own ends, for industry will not have the ready capital with which to expand. Our situation at the present time as regards unemployment is practically this: There are today about 10,000,000 wage earners who are out of employment. Our responsibility is to effect some legislation that will alleviate this condition. We have attempted to do it with Government-made work, but that has not been sufficient. In March 1933, when we had the peak of unemployment, there were approximately 15,000,000 wage earners out of work, so that in 3 years the number of unemployed has been cut about one-third. Where does this unemployment exist? Let us see. The railways of the Nation, because of various changes in transportation, because of consolidation, because of inventions and modifications, have had at least 1,000,000 men without employment in that sphere of activity. In the building trades there are approximately two and one-half million unemployed. In mercantile establishments there are about 500,000 more unemployed. In mining activities less than 60 percent have useful work. Today we are employing about 80 percent of the number that were engaged in 1929. In that year there were about 9,000,000 employed in the factories of this country. Today there are only about 7,000,000 workers, and it must be remembered that about 400,000 additional employables become of age every year. These must be taken care of. Why do I refer to these matters in relation to this tax matter? It is for this reason. Because I believe we should encourage industry to take on more people, give more people jobs, put everybody to work. For that reason I believe some special inducement should be held out to industry, and I therefore offer this amendment, which is designed to grant an extra exemption from taxation to all employers who put on additional help and give more jobs to the unemployed. This will encourage the owner of a factory or a shop to spend some of the income of his establishment for the purpose of expanding and enlarging his plant, taking on additional help, giving more jobs to more people.

Of course, you and I realize that the ablest men and women in the country will be consulted as to how this tax can be avoided and various devices will be worked out in order to escape it. There will be new business structures invented to take the place of corporations where that is feasible, and, in addition, surpluses will be invested in tax-exempt securities and we will not be able to reach them. This will mean, in the end, that we may raise less taxes than we are now receiving, and in order to avoid such a contingency, I want to leave some possibility that we will benefit, instead of lose, by this tax bill. I therefore hope that every one of you will support this amendment, and thereby induce private enterprise to spend its money to create new jobs and aid in the solution of the most difficult problem we have been facing for the last 6 years.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. While the motive of the amendment doubtless is good, yet the effect of it will be very bad. The purpose of this legislation is to bring about a more equitable system of taxation. In other words, to bring about greater equality in taxation. Under this amendment strong, wealthy, powerful corporations might be able to increase the number of their employees or the amount that each employee would be paid, while a competitor just across the street, not so favored, perhaps, struggling to hold together its organization and retain the number of employees it already has, would not be able to increase the number of its employees or to increase the pay that they would receive. The effect of this amendment would be diametrically opposed to the fundamental purposes of the bill. We have not had time to consider its full effects, but if I understand the full import of it, it would accentuate the inequalities in our taxing system rather than remove them. I trust the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Another point that might be very serious is the effect that it would have on the revenue which we are trying to raise under this bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Of course. It would seriously affect the revenue, which is the primary purpose of the legislation, the secondary purpose of it being to establish equality in taxation.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. So far as the revenue provision is concerned, if this amendment has the desired effect of putting more men to work and increasing the pay rolls of the country, it would seem to me it would do more good for the country and more than compensate for any loss of revenue which might occur.

Mr. DOUGHTON. It would be an unfair discrimination; it might increase employment in one corporation and reduce employment in a competing corporation.

Mr. BOILEAU. If so, any discrimination would be in favor of those corporations that actually increase their pay rolls and increase the number of people they put to work.

Mr. DOUGHTON. And they would have a lighter tax burden than their competitors who were unable to increase or enlarge their business.

Mr. BOILEAU. The competitor would likewise, to meet that competition, put more men to work.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Provided he had a market for the output of his factory and could make a profit, which this would not bring about at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOILEAU) there were—ayes 22, noes 67.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

(2) Dividends: The amount received as dividends—

(A) from a domestic corporation other than a corporation entitled to the benefits of section 251, and other than a corporation less than 20 percent of whose gross income is shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner to have been derived from sources within the United States, as determined under the provisions of this section, for the 3-year period ending with the close of the taxable year of such corporation preceding the declaration of such dividends (or for such part of such period as the corporation has been in existence), or

(B) from a foreign corporation engaged in trade or business within the United States or having an office or place of business therein, more than 75 percent of whose gross income for the 3-year period ending with the close of its taxable year preceding the declaration of such dividends (or for such part of such period as the corporation has been in existence) was derived from sources within the United States as determined under the provisions of this section; but only in an amount which bears the same ratio to such dividends as the gross income of the corporation for such period derived from sources within the United States bears to its gross income from all sources; but dividends from a foreign corporation shall, for the purposes of section 131 (relating to foreign tax credit), be treated as income from sources without the United States;

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL: Page 122, line 17, strike out the figures "75" and insert "85."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

(d) Compensation of officers and employees: Under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, every corporation subject to taxation under this title shall, in its return, submit a list of the names of all officers and employees of such corporation and the respective amounts paid to them during the taxable year of the corporation by the corporation as salary, commission, bonus, or other compensation for personal services rendered, if the aggregate amount so paid to the individual is in excess of $15,000. The Secretary of the Treasury shall submit an annual report to Congress compiled from the returns made containing the names of, and amounts paid to, each such officer and employee and the name of the paying corporation.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

Page 152, strike out all of lines 8 to 21, inclusive.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to go into any elaborate debate on the amendment. This question has been up before. It is a matter of making public the record of salaries in excess of $15,000. It seems to me it is purely a personal matter between the employee and the corporation by whom he is employed as to how much salary he receives. No benefit accrues to anyone except to satisfy curiosity seekers and others that want to make use of the information thus obtained. It certainly must be a great nuisance to the clerks to the Committee on Ways and Means to have these volumes stored there and people constantly coming and looking over those returns in the committee room. Just a few days ago I received a request to secure information in respect to salaries in a certain city in my district. The request came from the Community Welfare League, acknowledging they wanted to approach people getting salaries of $15,000 and over to have them make contributions. It seems to me the whole thing is a very silly performance and it is a form of publicity that does nobody any good and some people a great deal of harm, and simply satisfies curiosity. I hope the item will be eliminated from the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 502. CREDIT FOR OTHER TAXES ON INCOME.

There shall be credited against the total amount of the taxes imposed by this title an amount equivalent to the excess of—

(a) The amount of Federal income and excess-profits taxes payable by the taxpayer for the taxable year, over

(b) The amount of Federal income and excess-profits taxes which would have been payable by the taxpayer for the taxable year if his net income were decreased by the amount of net income taxable under this title.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, title III of this bill, "The tax on unjust enrichment", relates to the "windfall" tax concerning the processing taxes which were imposed under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Naturally there has been a lot of misunderstanding by Members and by those interested as to how this tax will operate. I want to make a brief statement for those interested, so that they will understand how the provisions of this bill are going to be administered and with a complete regard to the equities of each and every individual case.

There is a maximum of $237,000,000 involved in title III of this act, out of which it is estimated there will be net revenue to the Government of $100,000,000. That shows that in the collection of this tax a broad, liberal position will be taken by the Government. Of the $237,000,000, $181,000,000 is the amount that was impounded and either has been, or will be, paid back as a result of the decisions of the Supreme Court. This amount has been collected by the processor, or by the persons who caused the tax to be impounded. The tax has been passed on, in most cases, to the consuming public, who has paid them. The balance, $56,000,000, should have been paid but was refused, in anticipation of the Supreme Court decision on the Agricultural Adjustment Act by those who collected it. It was due but not paid.

The floor-stock tax and the refund in connection therewith is a different proposition, although related to the $237,000,000. The net revenue obtained from the windfall tax must take into consideration such refunds. This refund will not inure to any processors, as none had paid any tax on any processed commodities which were in the hands of some person or firm on January 6, 1936, to whom they had sold their processed commodity. Its purpose is to refund to those with floor stocks that which they would have received if the law was terminated by proclamation of the Secretary of Agriculture, as provided in the Agricultural Adjustment Act. The floor-stock refund will inure to those who purchased from a processor and paid him the tax at the time of purchase, and who had all or a portion of the processed commodity in their possession on January 6, 1936.

When the Agricultural Adjustment Act was passed these persons were compelled to pay a flour-stock tax on what they had on hand at that time. It is only fair that they should receive a refund consideration.

It is my understanding that $98,000,000 was collected at the time when the original A. A. A. was passed and the floor-stock tax, as provided therein, was imposed. There are many small independent packers who are worried about the effect of this tax, and properly so. My purpose is to try to state the situation as it will undoubtedly present itself to them so that they may realize that they are going to be dealt with as equitably as the circumstances can possibly permit.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. The committee has been very fair. The subcommittee has worked very hard. Every member of the subcommittee, both Democrat and Republican, worked diligently. They have brought out a very fine bill; as fine a bill as could be brought out under the circumstances. They have done a remarkable job and have been equally considerate with reference to the so-called windfall tax. Instead of confining the tax imposed in this bill to the processing tax which had been imposed and collected, and by levying the 80 percent as provided herein, we provide that if the business of any concern was wholly in processed commodities, even if it collected the tax but had not made a net profit, then it will pay nothing. In other words, if an owner has not received a net profit from a business which is entirely transacted in connection with processed commodities, he will pay nothing, even though he has collected the tax.

Mr. BEAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. BEAM. By that does the gentleman mean with a processing tax in effect on pork products, if there has been a deficit in other branches, for instance, in meat, could the packer charge off his deficit on beef and correlated products?

Mr. McCORMACK. If his entire business is transacted in connection with processed commodities, and in the conduct of such business he sustained a loss, he can. If not, he can segregate the processed commodity and then if he sustained a loss in connection with that, even if he collected the tax, but in the ordinary business he sustained a loss, he will pay no tax.

Mr. BEAM. That is what I want to make sure about. If the tax is not collected on products other than pork, he can off-charge it. Is that true?

Mr. McCORMACK. If it is absorbed he will not pay any tax. Even if he collected the tax, and he sustained a loss on the prccessed commodities, then he will not pay any tax. If he made a profit and the profit had nothing to do with the tax itself, even if the tax was imposed, that profit will not be subject to the 80 percent.

Mr. BEAM. That is what I wanted to make sure of.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Has any method been devised by which it can be determined whether these processing taxes were passed on or repaid?

Mr. McCORMACK. That, of course, is a matter which the books undoubtedly would show in the ordinary conduct of the business. I think that could very fairly be ascertained.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I understand in some instances it is practically impossible of any economical or accounting proof.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am satisfied that under the wording of this bill, with the intent of the committee, with the knowledge I have of what the Treasury intends to do, from my talks with Commissioner Helvering and his associates, that no businessman, big or little, affected by this tax, need have any hesitancy or fear about equitable consideration.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. McCORMACK. Certainly.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is it assumed that all these taxes were passed on? Is that the basis of dealing with them?

Mr. McCORMACK. No; the basis of dealing with them is a hands-across-the-table attitude.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the taxpayer or the processor who paid the tax have any opportunity to prove they were passed on or paid back?

Mr. McCORMACK. Absolutely. I think there is a presumption running in favor of the tax being imposed.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. If the gentleman will yield, that is the prima facie presumption; but it is subject to rebuttal.

Mr. McCORMACK. But if any owner, even if he collected the tax, can show that his business relating to the processed commodity resulted in a loss, he would not be compelled to pay the tax; and if he shows he sustained a partial loss there will be an apportionment made. In other words, there is the intent to be extremely fair to businessmen and there is no necessity for any businessman having any fear. I have in mind only one thought to convey to them, and that is this: They should come before the Treasury Department with clean hands, lay their cards on the table, and not try to hide any of the facts. If they do this, creating no suspicion with reference to their motives, they may well be assured that the operation of this bill and the provisions contained in this law with reference to the "windfall tax" will be administered equitably and with a regard to the ability of small business to pay any tax they may owe.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is making a very fine statement, in which the committee is greatly interested. I ask unanimous consent that he may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. I have taken this time because I realized there was a lot of natural fear entertained over the operation of this section of the bill. Members representing districts in which there are processors or independent packers, big or little—and let me say here there is not one processor or independent packer located in my district—spoke to members of the committee with respect to this title of the bill. It occurred to me, therefore, that it might not be amiss to state the true situation as I understand it in order that our colleagues and those interested might know the manner in which this law is to be administered.

Also, if he made a profit in two businesses, a regular business profit on which the processing tax was not applied, and he absorbed the tax, he will pay nothing. If a part of his business is in a processed commodity and a part is not, the activity in connection with the processed commodity will be segregated, and even if he collected the tax and had a net loss in connection with the processed commodity, under the bill he will pay no tax. Even in this case if he made a profit in the ordinary course of business and absorbed the tax he will pay nothing. If he collected the tax and made a net profit less than the amount of the tax, and a part or all of the net profit is attributed to the collection of the tax, it will be apportioned, and the tax will be imposed on that part relating to the processing tax collected.

If the tax was absorbed, no tax will be paid; if in part, only on that part collected. All persons subject to payment of processing taxes will be treated fairly. All efforts will be made to view the situation confronting each manufacturer and processor equitably. All doubts as to liability will be profoundly considered. I hope, as I am confident, that ability to pay even where processing taxes in whole or in part have been collected and where collection would mean bankruptcy will also receive practical consideration.

From my talks with Treasury officials I feel confident that every honest and equitable consideration will be extended. As I stated before, my best advice to all affected by this bill is to deal with the Treasury Department with clean hands, tell the truth, lay the cards on the table, and deal with the Government in a fair and square manner. [Applause.]

It is recognized that the independent or small-business man or firm affected is faced with grave business difficulties. Take, for example, pork, the first processing tax applied; in the first instance at 50 cents per 100 pounds, later at $1 per 100 pounds, and later at $2.25 per 100 pounds. The large processors were able to stock up when the tax was 50 cents, whereas the little fellow could not. The little fellow paid the $1 tax and in most cases $2.25. This increased his production costs. The big processor who bought live hogs in large numbers, paying the 50-cent tax, had a big advantage in the competitive field. This fact is realized and appreciated.

To further illustrate:

First. Assume taxpayer is in business of hog processing and pork packing during 1935; he brought an injunction suit and paid $10,000 in processing taxes into court, which amount was subsequently refunded to him. After the refund was made he still showed a net loss of $5,000 on his business for 1935. He is not subject to any windfall tax, since the tax in no case applies unless there is net income.

Second. Assume the same facts, except that the processor shows a profit for the period on his business of $5,000. This amount will be subject to the windfall tax unless the taxpayer is able to show that the burden of the processing tax was not passed on to others. If he is able to establish that he absorbed the tax, then the $5,000 would be subject only to the ordinary income tax on business profits.

Third. Assume that taxpayer is engaged in the business of flour milling and is also a dealer in coal. During 1935 he makes a profit of $10,000 on his coal business and shows a loss of $15,000 on his flour-milling business. During this period he brought an injunction suit to restrain the processing tax on wheat and paid $10,000 in the court, which was subsequently returned to him. No tax is due under the windfall tax, without regard to any question of passing on, since the taxpayer still showed his net loss on his flour-milling business after the $10,000 was repaid to him, and there is no base to which the tax could apply. The $10,000 profit on the coal business is subject only to the ordinary income tax.

Fourth. Assume a similar case, except that the taxpayer shows a profit of $15,000 on his flour-milling business and a loss of $15,000 on his coal business. The taxpayer is subject to the windfall tax on $10,000 processing taxes refunded to him unless he is able to show that he absorbed the burden of the tax. The loss on the coal business cannot be offset against the profit on the flour-milling business.

I again urge those affected to come in with clean hands. All factors will receive proper and equitable considerations by the Treasury Department. The desire is to protect the interests of the people who have paid the tax and at the same time to give to business practical and equitable considerations. Fear should not exist among businesses affected. They have been given by the committee and will receive from the Treasury the squarest deal they are entitled to. [Applause.]

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12395) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended be passed.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TREADWAY moves to recommit the bill (H. R. 12395) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, it was understood pretty generally, I think, that there would be no vote on the passage of the bill today. Quite a number of the Members are away. This was the understanding the other day. I trust that the vote on the final passage of the bill may go over until tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the vote on the final passage of the bill may go over until tomorrow.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it the understanding that the vote on the passage of the bill will be the first order of business after the reading of the Journal tomorrow?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I thank the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina that the vote on the final passage of the bill may go over until tomorrow?

There was no objection.

FIFTY-CENT PIECES IN COMMEMORATION OF THE ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE INCORPORATION OF BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 4229) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the incorporation of Bridgeport, Conn., as a city, as amended by the committee.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the incorporation of the city of Bridgeport, Conn., there shall be coined at a mint of the United States to be designated by the Director of the Mint not to exceed 10,000 silver 50-cent pieces of standard size, weight, and composition and of a special appropriate single design to be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, but the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the necessary dies and other preparations for this coinage.

SEC. 2. The coins herein authorized shall bear the date 1936, irrespective of the year in which they are minted or issued, shall be legal tender in any payment to the amount of their face value, and shall be issued only upon the request of the Bridgeport Centennial, Inc., Bridgeport, Conn., upon payment by it of the par value of such coins, but not less than 5,000 such coins shall be issued to it at any one time, and no such coins shall be issued after the expiration of 1 year after the date of enactment of this act. Such coins may be disposed of at par or at a premium by such Bridgeport Centennial, Inc., and the net proceeds shall be used by it in defraying the expenses incidental and appropriate to the commemoration of such event.

SEC. 3. All laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same, regulating and guarding the process of coinage, providing for the purchase of material, and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of coins, for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting, for the security of the coins, or for any other purposes, whether such laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein authorized.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, beginning in line 10, after the word "coins", strike out all the remainder of line 10 and all of lines 11 and 12 and "of this act", in line 13.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FIFTY-CENT PIECES IN COMMEMORATION OF ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT OF WISCONSIN

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 3842) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the establishment of the Territorial government of Wisconsin, and to assist in the celebration of the Wisconsin Centennial during the year of 1936, as amended by the committee.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in commemoration of the one-hundredth anniversary of the establishment of the Territorial government of Wisconsin, and to further and give added meaning to the centennial celebration of said State during the year of 1936, there shall be coined at a mint of the United States to be designated by the Director of the Mint not to exceed 20,000 silver 50-cent pieces of standard size, weight, and composition and of a special appropriate single design, containing some recognized emblem of the State of Wisconsin, to be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, but the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the necessary dies and other preparations for this coinage.

SEC. 2. The coins herein authorized shall bear the date 1936, irrespective of the year in which they are minted or issued, shall be legal tender in any payment to the amount of their face value, and shall be issued only upon the request of the chairman of the coinage committee of the Wisconsin Centennial Celebration upon payment by him of the par value of such coins, but not less than 5,000 such coins shall be issued to him at any one time and no such coins shall be issued after the expiration of 1 year after the date of enactment of this act. Such coins may be disposed of at par or at a premium by such committee, and the net proceeds shall be used by it in defraying the expenses incidental and appropriate to the commemoration of such event.

SEC. 3. All laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same, regulating and guarding the process of coinage, providing for the purchase of material, and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of coins, for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting, for the security of the coins, or for any other purposes, whether such laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein authorized.

With the following committee amendments:

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FLOOD CONTROL—NOW OR LATER

Mr. WALLGREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein copy of a national broadcast made by myself on the subject of flood control.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALLGREN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address which I delivered over the radio on April 22:

Flood control—now or later—I wonder should one dare to prophesy that some day this Nation will awaken and meet the challenge of waters that are menacing life, land, and property. At this moment the Nation is again flood conscious—will it be so tomorrow? To my mind there is no evading the final outcome—flood waters will have to be controlled.

During two Congresses I have been a member of the Flood Control Committee of the House of Representatives. Scores of worthy projects have come to the attention of that group. Each of these projects is additional evidence of the need for a comprehensive national program. Each project presents its own peculiar problem and indicates that the local interests have been unable to meet the situation. Yet the magnitude and cost of an effective program balks all action—action which may have recognized as inevitable but toward which few steps have been taken. One of President Roosevelt's first moves was to appoint the National Resources Board and subsequently the Water Planning Committee to study national resources and the water problem. These boards have taken definite steps toward the coordination of the available information. The Soil Erosion Service has already done good work toward control of surface water with its continual erosion.

However, little study is needed to show how unyielding are the waters and how meagerly has the national problem been met. While flood losses reach new peaks, the fundamental problem remains unchallenged. An omnibus flood-control bill was passed by the House last year. If adopted by the Senate, this measure will be the first Nation-wide effort to control floods.

Favorable action may now be gained on this bill, because we as a Nation are again flood conscious. Instead of an academic question as to the Federal Government's part in a flood-control program, it is now a question of relief, rescue, and rehabilitation following the worst flood in our history.

This recent and greatest of our many flood catastrophes should bring a majority of the public to a realization of our needs. For the well-being of the entire Nation this realization should not be allowed to subside until a comprehensive national program is formulated and adopted. If cold statistics would arouse public opinion, arouse it as does the trail of destitution and destruction left in the wake of flood, then surely a comprehensive flood-control program would be undertaken.

Support of the people is doubly necessary as the burden of proof in flood control always rests with those seeking a solution to the problem. We, as a people, are always ready to open our pocketbooks to help those made destitute by natural disaster. Seemingly, however, we hate to give a little each year in order that control may make disaster impossible.

This reluctance is due, I think, to the fact that only in time of nationally publicized floods do we know the immense loss annually to all sections of the Nation. There is no agency which accurately and systematically collects and studies information on the continuous direct and indirect flood loss.

Only a rough estimate of the total cost of floods is known. Flood-control opponents say that catastrophe comes only once in decades. The New England floods of 1927 were supposed to have been the share of that section for many years to come. The rivers this year forgot to look at the calendar.

But catastrophes aside, let's see what floods cost us each year. The Weather Bureau tells us that the loss during the last 33 years was $1,338,106,796. Nearly a billion and a half and no one has attempted to estimate the value of the 2,400 lives lost in floods during that period. Little attempt has been made to figure the loss from soil erosion, from interrupted transportation, from the impetus given the spread of disease or from the many other sources which, though difficult to figure, cannot be ignored.

Based upon the Weather Bureau figures, the annual loss would approximate forty and a half million dollars. The water planning committee makes another guess—it says $35,000,000. Both of these estimates consider only the tangible losses. The water planning committee thinks the intangible loss would be about $35,000,000; so its guess as to the total annual loss is $70,000,000.

Now, accepting the conservative flood-loss estimates as we have them, let me ask you to consider this problem as businessmen. What would you do if your business were faced with a preventable annual loss? Suppose that new equipment would eliminate this loss. There is but one answer, you would spend the money, buy the new equipment, and eliminate the loss. If a truck is costing more in repairs than you would have to pay for a new one, you would buy a new truck.

On a larger scale the Great Northern Railway gives us an example of long-term planning for profit in circumstances very similar to those surrounding flood control. In constructing the 7-mile tunnel through the solid granite of the beautiful Cascade Mountains in Washington State the railway company was looking to the future.

On the high railway grade the tracks were endangered by snow slides. Lives and property were constantly threatened. No one could tell just when a snow slide would occur. But the railway company couldn't trust to luck hoping that slides would cause no more damage. It proceeded to pinch pennies, figure the cost, and the probable return. The probable saving was balanced against the cost. Over a period of years the savings would more than pay for the construction.

Rather than balance the budget, the railway company went into debt over a period of years. It undertook this debt, not because a new track was absolutely necessary but because it would save money and probably lives. By spending millions of dollars in the 4-year construction period, savings were made possible each year thereafter.

The good business principles which led to the construction of this tunnel should and must be applied by this Nation to flood control.

How are we going to apply these principles? The answer is—by letting prevention of flood loss return dividends on whatever is spent. It is certain that the annual flood loss can be set at a minimum of $70,000,000.

In reaching conclusions as to the economic feasibility for river and harbor projects the Corps of Engineers demand a return of at least 4 percent on the capital invested. That is—the yearly savings made possible through the original expenditure must equal at least 4 percent of the total cost.

Applying this bookkeeping to flood control and capitalizing the annual flood loss ($70,000,000 at 4 percent), we have $1,780,000,000. It would be economically feasible for this Nation to spend a billion and three-quarters on a comprehensive program which would end disastrous floods.

In addition to flood loss we have an unemployment problem which promises to be pressing for some time. A part of any money spent on a flood program might well be charged against the need for unemployment relief. This makes the suggested expenditure doubly or triply feasible.

Flood projects would save money for all sections of the country and would materially benefit the Nation. During the last 33 years floods have been no respecter of locality. The 1933 floods in the Pacific Northwest ran up a loss of better than $15,000,000. Last year the Atlantic slope drainage area reported a $16,000,000 loss. In 1927 the North Atlantic loss was close to $50,000,000, and in 1921 Texas losses approached $30,000,000.

In coming years we cannot afford to sacrifice purchasing power. The close connection between floods and purchasing power has long been recognized. Bradstreet's review of business conditions has frequently mentioned the adverse effect of floods on general business.

We have just had one illustration of the drain disaster places on each State. Recent destruction has tapped directly the pocketbook of every section of the country. Red Cross appeals have appeared in almost every newspaper. But this is just one of the many flood catastrophes in which the Red Cross has aided. A report of that organization shows that in the past 11½ years it has spent more than twenty-one and a half million dollars to assist 228,000 families in disaster relief extended as the result of river floods in the United States.

This report further states that "at the present time the Red Cross is operating in flood relief in 13 or more States for which millions of dollars will be expended."

The Federal Government made its first donation for relief of flood-disaster sufferers in 1874, when it appropriated $90,000 for the aid of destitute along the lower Mississippi.

Today the Works Progress Administration has earmarked more than $18,000,000 for expenditure on emergency flood projects this spring.

Such conclusive figures should indicate the needs, but what steps should be taken remains the moot question.

The flood-control bill which passed the House last year provided for projects in 30 States. It would truly inaugurate a comprehensive program.

The possibilities of such a program are attested by a single headline in the New York Times of March 29. This was over a news item concerning the Vermont floods this year. I will quote that headline: "Flood in Vermont tamed by three dams." The subheadline continues, "Winooski Valley, which in 1927 had 55 deaths and heavy damage, almost untouched." The dispatch in the Times goes on to state that had the dams not been built, with relief labor, the unchecked waters "would have produced destruction quite as serious as that of 1927."

In order that projects already undertaken with relief funds, and those which may be approved by Congress, may be properly coordinated into a lasting flood-control scheme, a better accounting of water resources must be made.

To meet this need, I have drafted a bill which would create a National Flood Control Commission. This commission would be an independent agency charged with the development of water projects into comprehensive drainage and regional schemes. This would prevent haphazard development, such as we find in many sections of the country today; as in flood work one project is often dependent upon another. Where work has been started the commission would fit such plans into a comprehensive scheme and recommend further steps to increase the beneficial returns.

Where no project has been started it would investigate needs and review plans submitted by States and local interests. As I have already suggested to Congress, our flood program might parallel, in some respects, our Federal-aid highway program. In dealing with projects and plans developed by States, the Commission would make every investigation necessary to correlate such projects into the national scheme if preliminary study indicated the general worth of the plans.

Today the vital need for coordination is apparent even though the Federal Government did not spend a cent in actual construction. There is a vast amount of flood-control information in scattered files here, but it is not available for comprehensive study.

My time has expired, and in closing I state my belief that only an independent Federal agency can command the technical experience of all agencies in the Government to build a long-term flood policy which this Nation, with its technical ability, should have.

IOWA AND HER INDUSTRY

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, industry cannot flourish if agriculture languishes and the producer of raw products must suffer if the manufacturer is forced to close his doors. The prosperity of individuals and units is woven closely within the warp and woof of the welfare of the masses.

What is true of the Nation is equally true of the Commonwealth of Iowa, looked upon primarily as a grainery, a producer of meat, lard, and things edible, progressing in the said methodical but steady manner so characteristic of growing things.

I have commented upon the rural aspect of the Hawkeye State, its products, and the future of its agriculture. These things are coming more and more to be bound up inseparably with labor and industry, not only in surrounding areas, but within the State's own boundary lines, especially since the territory is rapidly becoming the center of a vast, growing industrial section, surrounded by the rich markets of Chicago, St. Louis, Omaha, Minneapolis, and Denver. Within another decade Iowa will become the center of a vastly larger consuming market in America.

The principal transcontinental lines of travel fling themselves across the fertile prairie lands of the Commonwealth that nestles between the two great navigable river systems, the Mississippi and the Missouri, stretching like ribbons of muddy, molten silver to the ports along the Gulf.

The State's position near the geographic center of the United States makes it an ideal location for industries seeking a far-flung market in the North, South, and Middle West. Iowa coal is of such a quality that it can be used successfully for heat and energy; this, coupled with the possibilities for the development of hydroelectric power, would provide electricity which can well be distributed to every hamlet and farmhouse in the Commonwealth, in addition to being made available for industrial purposes about which I have commented at greater length upon other occasions. Suffice it to say here that we have only scratched the surface, and the final result will be complete rural and industrial electrification at a reasonable charge for power.

Another vital factor in Iowa's manufacturing past and future is the human element, the inherent intelligence of her workmen, their ability to adapt themselves to new conditions, to become skilled in every line of endeavor, and to take keen interest in their work. There are few labor troubles, which is a tribute to the fairness and intelligence of both workers and employers. Frequently men in the shops and the plants own their own homes and contribute extensively to their community life. A majority of them are native Iowans and because of their intelligence and training in the most literate State in the Union are able to increase production in almost any type of plant. In 1929 Iowa manufacturers employed more than 82,000 laborers, purchased materials worth $562,000,000, and turned out products valued at $908,000,000. Their value added by manufacture was $328,000,000.

Iowa ranks approximately twentieth among the States in manufacturing, which position it has held since 1921. Although long recognized as the leading farm State, it has not generally been regarded as one that exceeded 22 other States in per-capita manufacturing. Her factories stand second only to her farms as producers of wealth and, in fact, factory income is not far below farm income in the State.

It is impossible to do more than discuss a few of Iowa's major industries in this rather sketchy review of her resources. A recent innovation in the State's manufacturing circles that is worthy of note, more for the sake of its potentialities than its present state of development, is the production of commodities from agricultural wastes, inspired and publicized in large part by Prof. O. R. Sweeney, of Iowa State College, at Ames, who comments as follows:

> Great industrial developments are usually built up in regions of abundant raw-material supply. This is especially true when the raw materials are present in large quantities and are supplemented by abundant supplies of other necessary materials, such as coal and water. Conditions favorable to such a development, using agricultural wastes as raw material, are present in the State of Iowa. There are produced annually in Iowa about 15,000,000 tons of cornstalks, 3,000,000 tons of corncobs, three-fourths of a million tons of oat hulls, 9,000,000 tons of oat straw, and about one and a half million tons of other straws. These materials are considered as waste materials, since they are largely wasted or are used for purposes where they have very little value.

These materials have been found to possess tremendous possibilities as raw materials. They are composed essentially of cellulose, lignins, and pentosans. Cellulose is, of course, the fundamental raw substance for innumerable products, such as paper, lacquers, rayon, moving-picture film, and smokeless powder. In the less refined form, cellulose obtained from cornstalks and corncobs constitutes the raw material for an extended variety of synthetic building materials, such as insulating board and wallboard, ranging in hardness, strength, and density from cork to ebony.

All of the products mentioned have been produced in the laboratory, but only the last named on a commercial basis. There are many types of the product; that made from pith is lighter in weight and better than cork board as a thermal insulator. What is known as mechanical board made by pulping entire cornstalks is stronger than the pith board and practically as good as a heat insulator. The boards from cooked pulp are still stronger, but not as satisfactory when used as heat insulators. The hardest and strongest of the series of board products is maizolith. This is made by heating cooked cornstalks to a jellylike pulp and drying to hard, hornylike mass. The material is then machined to the desired size and shape. It makes a satisfactory material for silent gears and electrical insulating parts.

I have been informed that the potential demand for insulation materials, especially board, in the United States is estimated at 10,000,000,000 square feet a year, while an estimate of the annual production of rigid and nonrigid types made prior to 1932 placed the volume at 525,000 square feet. There is a tremendous potential market in this field at home, not to mention foreign territories. If cornstalk board could absorb the difference between production and demand approximately four and three-quarter million tons would be required, which would bring to farm producers and those baling and transporting the stalks about $47,000,000 plus annually. In addition the industry would supply a market for large sums of money, labor, coal, and supplies. There is likewise a potential market for pressed board, but it is less definitely known. It will undoubtedly be large, because it has many advantages in the construction of panels for automobiles, trucks, Pullman cars, and interior trim. I dare not do more than touch lightly upon the possibilities of cornstalks, corncobs, oat hulls, and straw as a source of byproducts at this time and place lest my estimates prove entirely too low. It is known that the products contain the necessary ingredients for the manufacture of many things, however, such as tar, illuminating gas, linoleum, punk, white lead, incense, and wood-flour substitute.

Meat packing quite naturally is Iowa's largest industry. In 1932 the State ranked fourth in production, and is second only to Illinois in the output of pork products. It is the most rapidly growing enterprise in the territory, and an abundant supply of meat animals gives promise of continued expansion. As far back as 1929 the industry's production in Iowa represented 20 percent of the total in the United States, and 2.5 percent of the production of all industries in the State.

Poultry dressing and packing is likewise a growing industry in Iowa. In 1923 the total value of the product was $8,352,807. Iowa is the center of the poultry-raising area, with excellent supplies of feed and a convenient market, which indicates that the State may well become the leader in the industry. In fact, Iowa, because of livestock supplies, appears to be a logical location for continued growth in the entire packing industry. It not only has the cattle, hogs, sheep, and poultry, but is so located that the killers can operate economically. Transportation facilities, previously mentioned, are excellent, and the hauls to many large municipal areas are short. The tendency in the future will undoubtedly be toward curing and selling more products, rather than endeavoring to market large quantities of green meat.

The value of flour and grain-mill products in Iowa in 1929 was 1.3 percent of the total United States production of the industry and 1.5 percent of the total output of all Iowa industries. Iowa has an advantageous location for the establishment of mills for grinding not only her own grain products, but wheat in particular. A mill within the area can draw the product from the Northwest and Southwest territories, including the States of Kansas, Montana, Wyoming, Nebraska, Texas, Oklahoma, and the Dakotas. The product can be brought to Iowa, milled, and moved on to eastern points at the through rate from point of origin to destination. Bakers have indicated that the best bread is made from flour with the proper proportion of protein and gluten content, obtained by blending the wheat from various States. Of course, Iowa has a distinct advantage in this respect in view of the fact that her area lies directly in the pathway of east-bound freight that feeds the more populous sections of our country and is thus in a position to become an even greater processor of grain products, especially wheat.

Printing and publishing is a sizable industry in Iowa, having increased by 25 percent since 1921. In 1932 the value of its annual yearly production was approximately $36,000,000 plus. The State ranks ninth among all the States in the number of publications issued. It is fourth in the number of weekly newspapers and sixteenth in the number of monthly publications.

It is evident from these facts that Iowa has a large number of unusually fine daily and weekly newspapers and many readers thereof in every section. Their standing in comparison with publications in other parts of the country is evidenced by the many awards they have received from such groups as the National Editorial Association.

The cement industry in the Hawkeye State ranges in the neighborhood of 4.1 percent of the total United States production; clay products equal approximately 1.9 percent. In both instances the supply of materials is adequate to continue the respective industries for many years to come. Of late the market for cement has been curtailed, but will undoubtedly expand with the increase of industrial activity throughout the Nation.

Textiles constitute an important source of revenue for Iowa manufacturers. We produce about 2.1 percent of the total production in the United States of men's, youth's, and boy's clothing (except work clothing); approximately 1.4 percent of the total United States production of women's clothing; 2 percent of the total production of work clothing, with the exception of work shirts; and 3.7 percent of the total production of cloth and cloth and leather gloves. One of the most noted of American glove factories is located at Grinnell, Iowa.

Clay deposits constitute an important natural resource in the State and undoubtedly offer a promising future, not only in the field of building and ornamental brick, firebrick, and drain tile but in the production of other ceramic products. One of the largest brick and tile plants in the world is at Mason City. The industry is eighteenth in the State, with a total value of its products that runs between five and six million dollars.

Iowa plants turn out an extensive variety of products concerning many of which data is not available. About one-fifth of the State's manufacturing output naturally represents the processing of farm products, such as meat, milk, corn, and poultry. They have offered to consumers some of the finest meats, breakfast foods, corn products, soaps, flour, cheese, butter, and feeds on the American market.

The farm market has inspired the development of farm-machinery plants, with tractors, threshing machines, and gas engines very much in the lead. As far back as 1927 Iowa was second in the production of windmills and fifth in harness. The State is supreme in the manufacture of washing machines, supplying nearly one-half the national output. Even though the Commonwealth is not a timber State, it ranks high in planing-mill products—first in sashes, fourth in doors, and tenth in window and door frames.

Iowa is fifth in the production of dairymen's, poulterers', and apiarists' supplies, and maintains an important position in the field of wagon manufacture, motor-vehicle bodies and parts, gas engines, sheet-metal work, wirework, and numerous other products designed chiefly for the farm market.

Two industries deserve special attention because of their exploitation of relatively rare raw materials—gypsum and clamshells. Iowa has produced from one-eleventh to one-seventh of the Nation's gypsum products in the years since 1914, being second only to New York in output. As a center for the button industry, Iowa ranks second only to the Greater New York area, Muscantine being one of the world's leading centers of button manufacturing.

Mr. H. H. McCarty, of the University of Iowa, said very well in the Book of Iowa that—

> Never spectacular, but always important, are the industries to be found in nearly every locality designed to supply the wants of the local population. Limited by their nature to a geographically small market, their products seldom are found beyond the limits of a county, State, or perhaps a half-dozen adjoining States. Because they arise wherever one finds clusters of population, these industries rarely attract widespread attention. In Iowa, however, they contribute nearly one-third of the manufacturing income. Important among their products are printing, manufactured ice, ice cream, confectionery, bakery products, beverages, stonework, paving materials, rag rugs, tents, awnings, foundry and machine-shop products, electroplating, and railroad-shop products.

I am confident these small, local industries will grow in years to come. Every community should cooperate in an effort to stimulate them as they serve to augment agricultural production, absorb unemployment, and take up the slack in years when farming operations are not as profitable as they should be. Certain localities are peculiarly suited to the production of unique or specialized products for which there is generally a market, sometimes limited, but often extensive if cultivated. I have in mind the fact that some territories have unusually fine clays suitable to the manufacture of pottery, reeds for the making of outdoor furniture, and so on, through a considerable field of activity. Any local initiative should be encouraged by service organizations, as it may prove to be unusually lucrative not only to the producer but to many others with whom he comes in contact.

I trust it will be remembered that it is impossible for me in a brief address to do more than touch the high spots of Iowa industrial activity. There are many enterprises now coming to the fore within the confines of the State that are bidding for prominence in the annual production of the Commonwealth. We have a promising future in the field of manufacturing as well as agriculture. Fortunately transportation facilities as far as railroads are concerned are excellent, which with the proper rate schedules will facilitate the development of the manufacturing business. Of late years it has been augmented with the rise of trucks and busses, water transportation, and airplanes. Our State is directly in the pathway of the transcontinental air lines.

There is one remaining development of tremendous importance to the industrial welfare of our Midwestern State that should be advanced, and that is the matter of power, to which I referred earlier in these remarks. Fortunately we have a comparatively ample supply of coal in several regions of the State which can be used to advantage in mine-mouth operation of electrical units and municipal plants, which procedure would probably be one of the most economical methods of using the product and at the same time would stimulate the employment of many men in that particular field. Soon after I came to Congress I began urging upon the Government a proposal for a Missouri Valley authority of a similar character to that operating so successfully in the Tennessee Valley. Since that time the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [GEORGE W. NORRIS] has offered a proposal for a Mississippi Valley Authority, which would include the Missouri and other tributaries of the Father of Waters and would obviously be a vastly greater and more commendable program than my own. If the people will demand such a project, with a view to acquiring electrical energy at a reasonable rate for manufacturing purposes and rural electrification, industrial activity in Iowa will advance by leaps and bounds. The manufacturer and his workmen as well as the producer of raw materials will find a suddenly enhanced demand for their efforts, and thus the Hawkeye State will find herself on the highway to an even greater place in the field of industrial production which can further augment her tremendous agricultural income from the rich soil of her many fertile hills and valleys.

A PROPER BASIS FOR FEDERAL INTEREST IN A COMPREHENSIVE PLAN FOR FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address which I made before the Rivers and Harbors Congress on the subject of flood control.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following address by me before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, Washington, D. C., April 27, 1936:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Congress, we have witnessed in 1935 and 1936 another wasteful and destructive series of floods. The flood problem is becoming a real menace to this country. Lives have been lost, homes have been swept away, and destruction of property by floods in recent years has amounted to an annual average of approximately $300,000,000; for the present year, $500,000,000.

Therefore I deem it important that there should be recognized and definitely established a proper basis for Federal interest in a comprehensive plan for flood control, Nation-wide in scope and character.

During the present Congress the Committee on Flood Control of the House of Representatives has reported favorably 63 bills for preliminary surveys for controlling floods on streams in all sections of our Nation, many of which have been enacted into law. We have also reported and secured the passage of Senate bills for the same purposes.

Following each disastrous flood of the present year our committee has requested immediate surveys and reports on plans for the prevention of disaster in the future.

The act creating the Committee on Flood Control provides that the reports on such surveys shall include the economic value of the project, the cost of its execution, and a disclosure as to whether or not a Federal interest is involved, and if so, the extent of such Federal interest.

These examinations and surveys and the reported results thereof are under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers.

The controlling factor for the approval and execution of the projects is the extent to which a Federal interest is involved and to which the Federal Government should participate.

There has never been any general declaration by the Congress establishing the basis for the determination of what constitutes the Federal interest and establishes a national obligation.

I am sure that the War Department and the Corps of Engineers of the Army would be glad to have such a declaration for an established policy now, and such action would meet the hearty approval of the public.

At the first session of the present Congress I introduced H. R. 8455, which provided a comprehensive plan for flood control on streams throughout the Nation and approved projects according to merit, based upon economic value and for the protection of human life and property. This bill, having received a favorable report by the Committee on Flood Control, passed the House and is now before the Senate with certain amendments and with a favorable report from the Committee on Commerce.

One of the Senate amendments sets forth a declaration of policy, admirably designed, and which, in my judgment, establishes a proper basis for Federal interest and participation in the comprehensive plan, if enacted into law, and is so important that I should read it:

"DECLARATION OF POLICY

"SECTION 1. It is hereby recognized that destructive floods upon the rivers of the United States, upsetting orderly processes and causing loss of life and property, including the erosion of lands, and impairing and obstructing navigation, highways, railroads, and other channels of commerce between the States, constitute a menace to national welfare; that it is the sense of Congress that flood control is a proper activity of the Federal Government; that investigations and improvements of rivers and other waterways for flood-control purposes are in the interest of the general welfare; that the Federal Government should improve or participate in the improvement of streams for flood-control purposes if the benefits to whomsoever they may accrue are in excess of the estimated costs, and if the lives and social security of people are otherwise adversely affected; and that the interests of the Federal Government are particularly involved in such flood-control improvements as may otherwise be impracticable of initiation or execution on account of complications of relationships between States, their political subdivisions, or local organizations.

"SEC. 2. That, hereafter, Federal investigations and improvements of rivers and other waterways for flood control and other purposes shall be under the jurisdiction of and shall be prosecuted by the War Department under the direction of the Secretary and supervision of the Chief of Engineers; and that in his reports upon examinations and surveys, the Chief of Engineers shall be guided as to flood-control measures by the principles set forth in section 1 in the determination of the Federal interests involved."

So I submit to this Congress that this bill, with the projects approved by the House and the Senate, or that may be agreed upon in conference, with the declaration of policy, gives us a starting point for the final solution of the flood-control problem.

The execution of this comprehensive plan, by reservoir construction and stream control, will coordinate with the final completion of the project now under way in the alluvial valley of the Mississippi River from Cape Girardeau to the Gulf of Mexico, and assure greater safety and security. This project for flood control in the alluvial valley was approved as a national problem and obligation of the Federal Government by the Flood Control Act of 1928.

In view of the past record of service rendered by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, the public may feel assured of your continued efforts to make every opportunity available for protection and safety, and the conservation and beneficial use of streams and watersheds of our Nation.

DISTRICT COURT, MIDDLE DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA—POSTPONEMENT OF SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, there appears on the calendar a unanimous-consent order under which the Senate is to proceed today with the consideration of House bill 11098, known as the judges bill. I ask unanimous consent that the special order be postponed until Thursday, May 7.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I probably will not object, but one postponement has already been had with respect to this matter. Can the Senator give any assurance that the Senate will go forward with the bill on May 7?

Mr. ASHURST. The observations of my able friend from Oregon are quite correct. This is not only the first postponement but the fourth of the consideration of this bill. I should say to the Senate, however, that there has been able and determined opposition to the bill, and I do not feel in the present circumstances that we ought to take the time this day to consider the bill. I have conferred with the Senators who are opposed to the measure and they have no objection to having it go over until the day named; that is, Thursday, May 7.

Mr. MCNARY. At which time the Senator expects action on the bill?

Mr. ASHURST. At that time I shall ask for final action on the measure. I think I would become ridiculous if I should ask for another postponement at that time. So I assure my able friend from Oregon that this is the last postponement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona? The Chair hears none, and the special order is postponed until May 7.

THE WESTERN RANGE (S. DOC. NO. 199)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, pursuant to Senate Resolution No. 289 (submitted by Mr. NORRIS, and agreed to Apr. 24, 1936), a report relative to the range problem of the western United States.

Mr. NORRIS. I move that the report be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and that it be printed, with illustrations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Puerto Rico, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs:

Concurrent resolution to request of the Congress and of His Excellency the President of the United States, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, that the organic act of Puerto Rico be amended so that the bonds issued in the name of the people of Puerto Rico for self-liquidating projects, such as the Guayama and Isabela irrigation systems, hydroelectric systems, and other similar projects, shall not be included in computing the borrowing capacity of the insular government, and for other purposes

Whereas under the provisions of the organic act in force relative to bonds issued in the name of the people of Puerto Rico for self-liquidating projects, such as the Guayama and Isabela irrigation systems, hydroelectric systems, and other similar projects, the borrowing capacity of the insular government has been greatly reduced; and

Whereas by virtue of such reduction in the said borrowing capacity of the insular government, it is not possible to issue the revenue bonds authorized by the act deferring the payment of taxes on real property for a period of 10 years, the proceeds of which, if said issue were possible, would be applied to the restoration of the amortization funds, as well as to the relief of the municipalities of Puerto Rico; and

Whereas an increase in the borrowing capacity of the insular government would make possible the aforesaid issue of bonds, as well as that of any other bonds which may be authorized in the future by the Legislature of Puerto Rico for the purpose of taking care of undeferrable public services and to give financial aid to the municipalities which are in a precarious financial condition on account of the damages inflicted on agriculture and industry and on property in general by the hurricanes that have repeatedly swept our island: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of Puerto Rico (the Senate of Puerto Rico concurring)—

SECTION 1. To request, as it is hereby requested, His Excellency the President of the United States, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, and the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States to enact legislation amending the organic act of Puerto Rico to the effect that the bonds issued in the name of the people of Puerto Rico for self-liquidating projects, such as the Guayama and Isabela irrigation systems, hydroelectric systems, and other similar projects, shall not be included in computing the borrowing capacity of the insular government, so that the latter may issue the revenue bonds authorized by the act of the legislature of Puerto Rico deferring the payment of taxes on real property for a period of 10 years, the proceeds whereof shall be applied to restore the amortization funds and to the relief of the municipalities, as well as any other bond issue which may be authorized by the Legislature of Puerto Rico in the future.

SEC. 2. That a certified copy of this concurrent resolution be sent to His Excellency the President of the United States, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt; to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States; to the chairman of the Committee on Territories and Island Possessions of the Senate of the United States; to the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives of the United States; to the Secretary of the Interior, the Honorable Harold L. Ickes; and to the Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico in Washington, the Honorable SANTIAGO IGLESIAS.

at the present session of Congress, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Boro Park Branch, Against War and Fascism, of Brooklyn, N. Y., protesting against the enactment of the bill (S. 4011) to further reduce immigration, to authorize the exclusion of any alien whose entry into the United States is inimical to the public interest, to prohibit the separation of families through the entry of aliens leaving dependents abroad, and to provide for the prompt deportation of habitual criminals and all other undesirable aliens, and to provide for the registration of all aliens now in the United States or who shall hereafter be admitted, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution of the Townsend Clubs of the Forty-third New York Congressional District, protesting against the enactment of the bill (H. R. 11663) to require reports of receipts and disbursements of certain contributions, to require the registration of persons engaged in attempting to influence legislation, to prescribe punishments for violation of this act, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RELIEF PROGRAMS AND EXPENDITURES

Mr. BARBOUR. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read.

The clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 292), as follows:

Resolved, That the Works Progress Administrator is requested to transmit to the Senate at the earliest possible date the following information: (1) The amount of the present unexpended balance of the $4,880,000,000 appropriated for relief by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935; (2) the sums which have been legally obligated from such unexpended balance; (3) the estimated total costs of relief programs for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1936, for 4,000,000 relief cases on each of the following bases: (a) Direct relief only, (b) direct relief and work relief combined, (c) work relief only.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, anyone who attempts to study the administration's relief programs—past, present, and future—enters into a mystic maze so baffling that the odds are against his ever getting out. He must stumble into blind alphabetical alleys. He must follow appropriations and allotments as they zigzag through the executive departments and emergency bureaus. He must read signposts giving contradictory directions in a language as specialized and incomprehensible to the layman as that of the doctor or the astronomer.

I have tried to make some rhyme or reason out of the relief program, because I think it is important that the people of this country know how their money is being spent. I think that relief has cost us far more than is necessary. From all the information at my disposal, I am convinced that we could have cared generously for all relief cases for much less money than the administration has spent during these last 3 years.

We have seen how communities and States jettisoned their traditional principles of the "good neighbor" and of local responsibility, abandoning in many instances any attempt at aiding their own depression victims when the honey began to flow in golden streams from the Washington hive. We have seen this administration put men on humiliating and useless tasks in the self-righteous declaration that it was taking them off the "degrading dole."

We have seen politics and graft elbowing the needy away from the relief table. We have seen contradictions, duplications of effort, and changes of policy that have retarded the administration of relief and added uselessly to its costs.

Right now the ranks of unemployed are estimated to be as great as they were when this administration began. The New Deal recovery measures have not resulted in the absorption of any appreciable number of unemployed into private enterprise. Nevertheless, the administration now unburdens itself of part of the unemployment load, handing it back to the local and State agencies that it demoralized by centralizing relief in the Federal Government.

Here is the present situation: The unemployables are returned to State agencies, the transient unemployed are consigned to the tender mercies of the weather, and the employables are being continued on Federal boondoggling projects at tremendous cost to the American people.

A year ago an appropriation of $4,880,000,000 was made for relief. We no longer gasp at this Midas among appropriations. We are apt to forget that preceding that long string of ciphers there is a dollar sign. That money, together with previous obligations, we shall all be working to repay for as many years as are given us here on earth, and we shall pass the burden on to our children.

What happened to that giant sum? Was it all used to provide immediate relief to the unemployed? Is it all gone?

I have tried very hard to find the answers to these questions. I have searched the voluminous reports of the various relief administrations. I have made inquiries of them. I have found only a confused picture, very much in need of clarification.

In the Works Program report, dated March 16, 1936, there are some clues. On page 107 there is a table showing the status of funds under the $4,880,000,000 appropriation as of December 31, 1935.

On that date the President had "allocated" $4,244,804,049. Of this sum, $3,753,583,981.85 had been "allotted." Of this figure, $2,340,856,000.84 had been "obligated." The sum of $1,672,394,306.18 had been actually paid out.

These figures tell a very important story. They reveal that when the current fiscal year was half over the relief administration had actually spent only one-third of its appropriation. They reveal that, on that basis of expenditure, about two-thirds of the relief appropriation will have been used at the end of the fiscal year. If this is so, something like one billion and a half will then remain for next year's relief.

That this is likely to be the case is borne out when we remember that the President has asked for an additional billion and a half to be appropriated by the present Congress. That sum, added to the similar amount remaining from last year's appropriation, totals $3,000,000,000, which is, roughly, the amount apparently being spent for relief during the current fiscal year.

We have all heard of the man who hit himself on the head with a hammer because it felt so good when he stopped. [Laughter.] We have a parallel case in an administration which, estimating that it would need about $6,000,000,000 for 2 years of relief, appropriated $4,880,000,000 the first year and then tapered off to the less frightening sum of $1,500,000,000 the second year. When we realize that the first was a nonelection year and that the second contains a Presidential and congressional election, we can form an estimate of the political sagacity of those in command of the New Deal.

Most of this is, I admit, pure deduction. In my preface I said that it is impossible to secure an accurate picture of the relief situation. By the adoption of the resolution which I have today submitted I hope we may secure information as to the amount of the present unexpended balance of the $4,880,000,000 relief appropriation and also the amount thereof legally obligated.

That information is important enough in itself as a measure of how much we should appropriate for next year's relief program, but it becomes of supreme importance when we realize that there is a possibility that we need not appropriate one single additional penny and still maintain adequate relief for next year's unemployed.

Viewed in another way, it is important if we can save for the Federal Treasury a billion and a half dollars and so bring the current Budget nearer to a balance.

The same confusion in the relief picture makes it impossible to estimate accurately relief costs. However, I have seen unofficial estimates showing that relief costs could be reduced for the fiscal year beginning in July so that expenditures would be from $840,000,000 to $1,811,200,000, depending on the number of cases involved and the type of relief offered.

To care for a possible 4,000,000 cases—that is, persons and families—would require an estimated annual total expenditure of $1,448,960,000 through emergency work relief; or $1,365,600,000 through emergency work relief and direct home relief combined; or $960,000,000 through direct home relief only.

I have no way of knowing whether these figures are reasonable, but I submit that they are well worth investigating. If they turn out to be approximately correct, and if there remain a billion dollars and more from last year's relief appropriation, then we shall need to appropriate no more this year for relief.

The need of reorganizing relief on more efficient and economical lines is becoming recognized everywhere. I have a statement of the American Association of Social Workers which says, in part:

> The Federal Government's present program, while offering the opportunity of work for a large proportion of those in need, in effect abandons the remaining families and persons to a precarious and deplorable existence dependent upon inadequate and often nonexistent local resources.
> The public fails to comprehend that despite the enormous sums available the recent change in the Federal program has increased rather than lessened the misery and deprivation of a large part of the unemployed and others in need. The imperative need is the realignment of Federal, State, and local forces in a supreme and sustained effort, reaffirming the policy of a cooperative relationship between the three levels of government covering financial participation and standards of personnel and administration.

The resolution which I have submitted calls for the estimated costs of three types of relief programs on an arbitrary basis of 4,000,000 relief cases.

The resolution may need some explanation. The information first sought is the present unexpended balance of the $4,880,000,000 relief appropriation of last year. I have not set any date, but I presume that the information would be supplied as of the date of adoption of the resolution.

The information sought in the second place is as to the "sums which have been legally obligated from such unexpended balance." I have used the word "legally" because it appears from the works program report that the obligations in the table I quoted early in my remarks do not, the report states, "necessarily represent in all cases an immediate legal liability."

The information next sought is the estimated total costs of relief programs for next year for an arbitrary 4,000,000 relief cases on 3 bases: (1) Direct relief only, (2) direct relief and work relief combined, and (3) work relief only. I have chosen 4,000,000 cases for the purpose of having some definite basis for computation.

All this information ought to be readily available to the Works Progress Administrator. It does not put any excessive burden on him. It will put no department to any additional expense.

I sincerely urge that this resolution be adopted as soon as possible. It will elicit information we ought to have. It may lead to a substantial saving to the Federal Treasury. It may provide the basis for an economical relief system.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table.

NATIONAL FLOOD CONTROL—AMENDMENT

Mr. LOGAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8455) authorizing the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors for flood control, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO PRICE DISCRIMINATION BILL

Mr. AUSTIN and Mr. COPELAND each submitted several amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (S. 3154) making it unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to discriminate in price or terms of sale between purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality, to prohibit the payment of brokerage or commission under certain conditions, to suppress pseudo-advertising allowances, to provide a presumptive measure of damages in certain cases, and to protect the independent merchant, the public whom he serves, and the manufacturer from whom he buys, from exploitation by unfair competitors, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

FEDERAL HIGHWAY ACT—AMENDMENT

Mr. CAPPER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 11687) to amend the Federal Aid Highway Act, approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

THROWING AWAY OUR MARKETS—ADDRESS BY GEORGE N. PEEK

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, Hon. George N. Peek, former trade adviser to the President and former head of the Export-Import Bank, delivered an exceedingly illuminating address at Philadelphia on the evening of February 23, 1936, on the subject Throwing Away Our Markets. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I was first drawn into public affairs through my concern in the farm problem of the United States. Possibly my activities in that connection are familiar to some of you. I shall not go into them today beyond reiterating my belief that the permanent restoration of economic balance between agriculture and industry is the paramount problem in our national existence and that the primary function of our foreign activities should be to facilitate this balance.

During the past year or so there have been recurrent references in the press and elsewhere to my alleged differences with the administration as to foreign-trade policy. These differences have been real enough and they led to my resignation last November. At the same time they have not been based on personal or partisan motives. The whole question of foreign trade and its relation to our economic policy is far more important than any personalities that may be involved. The question is not a partisan one at present. It should not be thrown into the caldron of a political campaign. It can and should be settled by men of good will in both parties acting together for the national good. If it is not so settled, it will become political and may cut into present party lines with results no one now can foresee.

It was the realization that a solution of the farm problem was inextricably bound up with the character of our foreign trade activities that led me into the field of foreign-trade policy. My studies and activities in that field have strengthened this belief. I have attempted to approach the problem in simple terms of facts and figures. My disagreement with the administration has been based upon the growing feeling, substantiated by experience, that the State Department and others engaged in the foreign-trade activities of the United States were formulating American foreign-trade policy in terms of philosophic or academic theories as to the nature and function of international trade in general rather than in terms of the specific needs and problems of our domestic economy.

Before proceeding further it may be helpful to glance briefly at the conditions affecting world trade today.

Some of you are familiar with the fundamental changes in the character of international trade during the last 5 years due to—

(1) The changed economic position of many nations, the spread of industrialization, and the advances in industrial processes involving the use of new materials and new sources of supply, all of which has definitely altered what was previously known as the normal channels of trade.

(2) The break-down of the international money system used to conduct international trade.

(3) The increasing direct participation in international trade on the part of governments, which has resulted in international trade becoming the affair of governments trading in their national interests, rather than of individuals trading solely for individual profit.

These factors have produced a situation where our foreign trade is confronted everywhere by devices designed to protect the economic position of various nations, such as high tariffs, administrative restrictions, quota systems, exchange controls, special bilateral arrangements from which we are excluded, and others. I believe that this situation represents a fundamental change in the character of international trade, rather than a temporary passing phase.

Under existing conditions the term "internation" trade more accurately describes the situation than "international" trade.

To these elements making for change in the character of international trade we must add the feeling of political insecurity and the fear of war which exists in many nations today. It is frequently referred to as nationalism. From the economic point of view it aims at economic self-sufficiency. Its general effect is to increase the volume of domestic business at the expense of international trade. Wars may be averted or may be localized, but however this may be, there is no question as to the wholehearted desire and determination of the American people to stay out of them if it is humanly possible. Should war occur, the United States again will be confronted with grave problems of both trade and diplomacy if it is to preserve its neutral position. Just as ill-considered trade and financial policies can drag us into war, so can carefully considered and well defined financial and commercial policies facilitate the maintenance of our neutrality. But foreign wars are not the only peril. Too often in the past we have suffered from the shock of economic and financial catastrophes abroad which we have been powerless to prevent but which, nevertheless, have served to bring our national economy to the point of ruin. The history of our depressions during the past 70 years shows that we have been profoundly affected by events abroad. Surely it is the part of wisdom and true statesmanship to devise our financial and economic policies so as to afford as much protection as possible to our domestic economy against the ill winds that may blow toward us from the rest of the world.

One hundred and sixty years ago in this historic city of Philadelphia the Liberty Bell rang out our political independence of the Old World. Sixteen years ago, in a great and solemn referendum involving the question of our joining the League of Nations the Nation declared itself in no uncertain terms as still unwilling to join with Europe in foreign political entanglements. I wonder what our founders and forefathers would say today, in those polished phrases of theirs, if they knew that leading Government administrators are now proclaiming our economic dependence on the Old World in such prideful words as these: "We are to a greater degree than ever before meshing our domestic economy into world economy." And this one: "Our objective is the general amelioration of the world situation." American recovery can wait while our internationalists reform the world.

I cannot speak for the founders in polished phrases, but I can repeat a question asked by one of them:

"Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?" (Washington's Farewell Address, Sept. 17, 1796.)

Furthermore, I can speak with such authority as official figures give me to speak.

The Nation has not known the true status of its trade position. It could not know until plain figures were set down in simple arithmetic.

We now have certain facts at our command which disclose that:

(1) Our recklessness in extending dollar credits during and since the war, ostensibly to enable foreigners to buy our goods, has been thoroughly exploited by foreign nations with a resulting draining off of our liquid resources and huge losses to our investors and taxpayers.

(2) The increased prices paid by us for gold and silver are continuing and accentuating this process.

(3) The reciprocal trade agreements program, as at present administered, is operating in this same direction.

(4) The trade agreements program is breaking down the American market for American agriculture and industry, and by contributing to the prolongation of the farm crisis is undermining the whole basis of recovery.

(5) A change in our procedure is necessary if we are to acquire and maintain economic independence.

It is my purpose to discuss these in order.

(1) Ever since the war the credits established ostensibly for the purpose of buying our goods were not used generally for that purpose; or, if so used, our investors were not fully repaid.

It will be recalled that to create dollar credits for foreigners (a) during the war we repurchased some of our securities and made Government loans abroad; (b) during the twenties we made foreign loans generally.

The net result is that from 1914 to 1933 our nationals invested in foreign securities (exclusive of the war debts) about $19,000,000,000.

As of December 31, 1934, we held only $5,200,000,000.

The difference, retired, refunded, or repatriated, was approximately $14,000,000,000.

The bankers' commissions and discounts from this financing are reported to have amounted to about $1,190,000,000 between 1914 and 1933.

This practice of lending money abroad imprudently and overgenerously permitted foreigners to build up from the proceeds of these loans a large body of short-term and highly liquid investments in the United States.

During the period of European reconstruction alone, namely, 1923–29, the United States provided the world with purchasing power in the amount of $7,140,000,000 through our purchases of foreign securities and other investments made by us in foreign countries. Less than $2,600,000,000 of this amount was used by the world to balance exchange of goods, services, and gold with us. The remainder, some $4,500,000,000, was used to buy stocks and bonds and to build up foreign short-term investments and bank deposits in the United States to more than $3,000,000,000 in 1929.

During the period 1930–33 foreigners' withdrawals of short-term funds exceeded $2,500,000,000.

The threat of the overnight withdrawal and the actual withdrawal of these funds substantially contributed to the demoralization of our banking system and to the shattering of our price levels. We thus made possible our own depression by our own financial policy from 1923 to 1929.

(2) The increased prices paid by us for gold and silver are continuing and accentuating this process.

In 1933–34 we inaugurated our gold and silver purchase policy, with the net result that in 1934 and 1935 the excess of imports over exports of gold and silver, after deducting the balance due us for merchandise, amounted to approximately $2,600,000,000.

The question will arise in your minds immediately, What were these credits being used for if foreign nations were not using them to purchase goods or to pay debts? My answer is that the figures show that they were being used to buy their own and our securities and to build up bank balances. The extent to which this occurred is indicated in the figures covering the total international movement in dollars for the settlement of transactions of all kinds—i. e., capital and gold, commodity and service, tourist expenditures, and immigrant remittances, interest, and dividends. In 1919 capital transactions absorbed 8.9 percent of the total, while commodity and service took 70.7 percent. In the first half of 1935 preliminary figures indicate capital transactions had come to absorb 52 percent of the total, against 38.8 percent for commodity and service transactions.

In this connection it is significant to note the League of Nations report published in 1935 which states that the United States private long-term investments abroad were reduced between the end of 1930 and the end of 1934 by $2,056,000,000; further that the cash received was $566,000,000; this is about 27½ cents on the dollar for securities for which the American people paid about 100 cents on the dollar—a very profitable business—for foreigners.

Turning for just a moment to foreign holdings of American securities, Government figures disclose that at the end of 1934 they amounted to some $6,000,000,000, which was far more than Government estimates of our holdings of foreign securities if you exclude the war debts.

Please keep in mind that these are not my figures. They are our Government figures, with the single exception of those of the League of Nations to which I have referred.

I do not criticize foreign nations; they have done well for themselves under difficult conditions; I congratulate them upon their acumen. I do criticize this administration, with the history of the 20's and the early 30's clearly of record, in continuing to permit the drain upon the liquid resources of the Nation.

The President understood the situation clearly when he dispatched his historic message of July 3, 1933, to the London Economic Conference:

"* * * I do not relish the thought that insistence on such action (stabilization) should be made the excuse for continuance of the basic economic errors that underlie so much of the present world-wide depression. * * * The sound internal economic system of a nation is a greater factor in its well-being than the price of its currency in changing terms of currencies of other nations. * * * We must rather mitigate existing embargoes to make easier the exchange of products of which one nation has and the other has not * * *."

This was a declaration of economic and financial independence from Europe that should have led toward its establishment in fact. It has not done so. Subsequent policy developments have sabotaged it. Yet it represented a high national aspiration which the President now seems to have forgotten. Why? What happened to make him falter in his purpose? Your guess is as good as mine.

(3) The reciprocal trade agreements program, as it is being administered, is not in the economic interest of the United States.

Now I shall discuss this program. It is my considered judgment that the administration has gone dangerously astray in its adoption of a foreign-trade policy which, for the most part, is in conflict with our internal economic problem and policy, particularly as regards agriculture, and which in some respects is diametrically opposed to the attainment of domestic economic balance. It is not, therefore, in the interest of the United States.

Our present foreign-trade policy is based upon the theory that if we supply foreigners with a greater purchasing power they will take more of our goods and pay their debts. To furnish this added purchasing power we are engaged now in a general reduction of the tariff by means of the trade-agreement program. The theory is that increased imports will lead automatically to increased exports and better prices. A variation of this theory is that if we buy more from South America and Asia, where we have large adverse balances of trade, those continents will be enabled to increase their payments for goods and debt service to Europe and that Europe then, in turn, will purchase more goods from us. This is the theory known as triangular trade. It is a beautiful thought. We are acting on it. It does not work in our interest. Beside this the administration has refrained from making any particular effort to collect what is due us on public and private debts. Over and above this, however, as we have seen, we are placing an enormous amount of dollar exchange in the hands of foreigners through our stupendous purchases of gold and silver at fancy prices. There can be no question as to the buying power we have placed in the hands of foreign nations. They are not using it to buy our goods.

Now, I have no wish to quarrel on questions of theory. There is an old saying that "the proof of a pudding is in the eating." The question is how has it worked? What are the concrete results under this policy? The results are matters of ascertainable and measurable fact. There are enough facts available to justify testing our foreign-trade policy against them:

The first visible result may be found in the striking increase of imports as against a nominal increase of exports, with the complete elimination of our favorable balance.

In 1933 our exports of merchandise, gold, and silver exceeded our imports of these commodities $357,000,000. In 1934 our imports exceeded our exports $825,000,000. In 1935 our imports exceeded our exports $1,840,000,000. In the 2 years 1934 and 1935 our imports exceed our exports between $2,600,000,000 and $2,700,000,000.

Merchandise exports	1,675	2,133	2,282
Merchandise imports	1,450	1,655	2,047
Favorable balance	225	478	235

At the same time we have imported vast quantities of gold and silver at greatly increased prices.

Gold (net imports (−); net exports (+))	+173	−1,217	−1,739
Silver (net imports (−))	−41	−86	−336
Leaving net credits for foreigners on these items	+357	−825	−1,840

What have foreigners done with the proceeds of these imports? They have not paid debts, nor have they increased their purchases of American goods to any extent. I repeat these excess dollar balances have gone into security and capital transactions. They have repurchased their own securities, often at greatly depreciated prices and have acquired increasing equities and ownership in American enterprises. Foreigners are putting us to work for them. We are reduced now to a debtor-nation status on short-term account. Our creditor position exists only by virtue of the war debts of some $10,000,000,000, whose real value is problematical, and our direct investment abroad in branch factories, mines, public utilities, and the like, the present as well as the realizable value of which is almost equally problematical. Our so-called creditor position was reduced by nearly a billion dollars in 1934 and an estimated billion and a half in 1935.

Our debts, public and private, have remained largely uncollected. In our anxiety that foreign nations should have plenty of purchasing power for use in the United States and elsewhere, we have refrained from enforcing payments due us, even when it was in our power to do so. We allow the war-debt nations to trade freely in our markets and to operate upon our security exchanges. We do not even suggest that they liquidate their debts through the transfer of American securities which they now hold. In certain other nations where we make large purchases and have unfavorable balances we refrain from utilizing our position to insure payments due and overdue on current shipments of goods and debt service. These nations, too, are given all the benefits of our markets.

Thus, for years we have supplied foreign nations with buying power, first through the war credits, then through the foreign-loan policy, more recently through our gold and silver purchase policy. We are now enlarging this buying power by giving them a larger share in our domestic market through the operation of the trade-agreements program with its insistence on the unconditional most-favored-nation principle in its broadest application.

We have seen what this theory of foreign purchasing power is doing for foreign nations, and, in referring to their utilization of it, my attitude is not one of criticism of them but one of admiration for their astuteness. I shall now turn briefly to its effects on our domestic economy.

(4) The trade-agreements program is breaking down the American market for American agriculture and industry and by contributing to the prolongation of the farm crisis is undermining the whole basis of recovery.

I have referred to our changed balance of trade, increased imports, and almost stationary exports. Analyzing these a little bit, what do we find? In competitive agricultural products we have an increasingly unfavorable balance of trade. We are bringing in large quantities of wheat and other grains, dairy products, cattle, and other foodstuffs, textiles, and other manufactured products, to the detriment of our domestic producers. At the same time we are losing our markets for cotton, wheat, and pork products, our principal export crops. This tendency began to appear in the twenties; the present program is accentuating it. This means that the United States is no longer feeding and clothing itself. We have taken American farmers out of foreign markets and put foreign farmers into American markets. Another thing, our ability to purchase the large quantities of coffee, tea, rubber, silk, and other commodities which we do not produce, in the past has been supported in large measure by our ability to sell cotton, wheat, tobacco, and pork products abroad. A curtailment of this source of purchasing power can only tend to a lower standard of living. Increased sales of American automobiles or other specialties abroad do not counterbalance this loss; neither do they correct the disparity between industry and agriculture. On the contrary, under the present program, agriculture has definitely lost ground in its fight for equality with industry. The loss of foreign markets has led to attempts at crop restriction at home while stimulating production abroad. It has reduced the purchasing power of our agriculture. It is prolonging the farm crisis and the relief rolls.

As a matter of fact, it is incorrect to describe our foreign markets as "lost"—we have simply abandoned them without a struggle. The case of cotton is particularly flagrant. Our policy of cotton-crop restriction and the refusal of the responsible officials to trade realistically in foreign markets has resulted in the surrender of a large part of our historic share in them to other nations and has encouraged the development of new cotton growths abroad. The Department of Agriculture, in a public release March 10, 1936, said that foreign growths increased 1,400,000 bales this year over last.

In a number of recent public statements, I have had occasion to refer to the fact that those in the administration charged with the responsibility of disposing of our farm surpluses have refused to trade realistically in foreign markets and have prevented others from doing it when substantial trades were offered. I have further indicated my belief that this is a matter which calls for full and searching congressional inquiry. Here are two examples:

(a) It may be recalled that in my testimony February 1, 1935, before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I discussed a proposed cotton transaction with Germany in 1934, by which we would have sold to Germany cotton up to 800,000 bales, receiving payment 25 percent in dollars and the remainder in special marks usable for the purchase of German goods. This deal was opposed by the State Department and subsequently fell through. The net result, according to the German press, is that, whereas we supplied Germany with 80 percent of her cotton in 1933, we supplied only 55 percent in 1934 and 29 percent in 1935.

(b) Last summer (1935) another somewhat similar proposal was made by responsible German interests looking toward the purchase of 800,000 bales of cotton. The proposal was to the effect that the cotton would be purchased through regular marketing channels by the cotton spinners of Germany and the primary obligations of payment would be assumed by a German bank or banks to be selected by the Export-Import Bank; that these obligations would be collateralized $125 for each $100 of the obligation by the deposit of negotiable warehouse receipts representing commodities to be selected by the bank, warehoused outside of Germany in countries to be selected by the bank; that all essential governmental permits would be forthcoming from Germany; and that the cotton would be used only for domestic commercial consumption. The officials and the executive committee of the bank felt that the proposal merited most serious consideration, and this was authorized last August. Later the State Department requested that the proposal be referred to it. This was done; on November 15, 1935, a memorandum was submitted by the bank to the Department of State for an expression of the Department's view in the matter. Although more than 5 months have elapsed, the State Department has given no indication of its views so far as I know, and there the matter rests with the cotton still unsold.

Neither of these transactions involved price concessions.

It seems clear that we are not going to sell our cotton unless we make an effort to sell, and this the administration seems reluctant to do, apparently preferring instead to continue its attempt to restrict production and to regiment the farmer in one way or another. Personally, I feel that an ounce of selling effort is worth a pound of crop restriction.

These are but two examples. There are many more which have been thwarted by the Government departments during the last 3 years.

Yet, according to the New York Times of March 7, 1936, in a dispatch from Memphis, Tenn., there is little hope for a change in policy by the administration. This dispatch said:

"Small hope was held out by Mr. Wallace (Secretary Wallace) for any deliberate action under the new (farm) program to restore to their former volume currently impaired foreign markets for cotton. Anything undertaken in this direction, he warned, would have to be subordinated to the reciprocal-trade program of Secretary of State Cordell Hull."

Our officials not only have refrained from utilizing our bargaining power on behalf of cotton and other export crops, but have been throwing it away with both hands under the unconditional most-favored-nation policy. Our bargaining power has been progressively diminished with the conclusion of each trade agreement and the generalization of its concessions. A continuation of this policy will diminish even more our ability to negotiate in a manner that will meet our specific export needs.

The result of this policy of "meshing ourselves in world economy" to "ameliorate the world situation" already is reflected not only in the prolongation of the farm crisis but in continued unemployment, both urban and rural. The policy leads moreover to increased foreign control over our trade and our price levels, and increasingly exposes us to unfavorable developments in foreign countries over which we have no control. This is the price we pay, and I submit that it is far too high.

I submit further that it is unnecessary. With our continental resources we can come close to supplying all our essential needs. What do foreign nations have which we cannot supply ourselves? Coffee, tea, rubber, silk, manganese, tin, and some other mineral products. Very well, let us trade for these. For the rest, particularly for competitive agricultural and industrial products, let us keep the American market for our own people. Against these essential imports we used to have crop surpluses to exchange. Now we are trying to restrict their production. This is the core of our foreign-trade problem. A little genuine Yankee trading and realism upon the part of our responsible officials will go far to bring an end to the depression.

The internationalists are preventing our holding our position in foreign markets and are throwing away our domestic markets. The result is continued unemployment in the factory and on the farm, long relief rolls, and higher taxes. For what? For an exploded theory, abandoned by its own mother, Great Britain. England, for centuries the principal trading and financial nation of the world, with a greater stake in foreign trade than any other country, revolutionized her national economic policy in 1931 to meet the new trends in international trade. She revived protection, went off gold, started keeping detailed books on her foreign commercial and financial transactions. She moved away from the most-favored-nation theory and negotiated a large number of special preferential trade agreements, both with her dominions through the Ottawa agreements and with other nations wherever she could find a basis of mutual interest. Her slogan was "Buy from those who buy from us." The result has been a definite improvement in England's foreign trade and material progress toward her national recovery. We elect, however, to follow her old exploded theory rather than her modern one.

(5) A change in our procedure is necessary if we are to acquire and maintain economic independence.

The field in which government can and should act effectively thus becomes more clearly defined. The recommendations that follow are self-evident: We should check competitive agricultural and industrial imports by tariffs, quotas, embargoes, or otherwise, and give the American farmer and industrial worker the full benefit of the domestic market, so that we can remain more nearly on a self-sustaining basis. We should stop this policy of purchasing gold and silver from abroad at improvident prices. We should abandon the unconditional most-favored-nation policy and regain our bargaining power. The American market is the greatest in the world. Other nations will pay a high price to enter it—they might even pay their debts.

We should trade selectively both as to imports and exports, dealing country by country and, if necessary, as in the case of cotton, commodity by commodity. We should inaugurate a simplified system of internation bookkeeping, so that we can know at all times where we stand in our commercial and financial relations with any given country. We should establish a competent foreign-trade authority which will determine policy for the State Department to execute. An organizational defect of our present set-up is that foreign-trade policy is completely dominated by the Department of State. This is not as it should be. Of all Government departments, the State Department, like all foreign offices, has the least direct contact with our domestic problems. It is the one most highly susceptible to foreign pressure. The characteristics which should make it an admirable negotiating agency are precisely those which disqualify it to act as the formulator of national economic policy. It is like asking the sales department of a business to formulate its whole policy.

In conclusion, the final judges of any trade policy must be the people of the United States as a whole acting through their Representatives in Congress. When it comes to general national policy, I have more confidence in the instinct of the people back home than in the rationalization of departmental officers. I feel, therefore, that the authority of Congress in these matters should be reasserted; that Congress should resume its functions as the policy making arm of the Government; and that it should recapture its right to approve or disapprove of the results achieved by the trade agreements negotiated by the executive arm of the Government. This is the only sound procedure for the people of the United States if they want to keep our form of government and to avoid autocratic personal domination.

EFFECT OF PROPOSED FLOOD-CONTROL LEGISLATION ON PITTSBURGH

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Pittsburgh Press of Tuesday, April 28, 1936, with respect to proposed flood-control legislation and its effect on Pittsburgh. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and the members of the committee will have time and will take the opportunity to read the editorial.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Pittsburgh Press of Apr. 28, 1936]

A PUZZLING STATEMENT

Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND (D., N. Y.), chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee in charge of flood-control legislation, made a statement yesterday that will puzzle most Pittsburghers.

The Senator was defending the flood-control bill reported by his committee, which appropriates $55,000,000 for the construction of flood reservoirs in the Ohio River Valley, but provides that the Pittsburgh district pay one-half of the land and damage costs, or about $16,000,000.

During the course of his remarks, Senator COPELAND declared that Pittsburgh could well afford to pay all the land and damage costs to prevent a reoccurrence of the recent destructive flood. All the costs would amount to $34,000,000; however, only one-half is demanded.

Just how the Senator arrived at this conclusion is something he did not explain. Apparently, Mr. COPELAND is not familiar with Pittsburgh finances and does not know that the city's budget has been out of balance for the last 3 years, that essential street repaving projects have been postponed time after time because money was not available; that the city already has a bonded indebtedness of nearly $65,000,000, and that the total borrowing margin is only $24,000,000, or far less than would be sufficient to pay for the land and damage costs in connection with the flood reservoirs.

Likewise, Senator COPELAND does not seem to realize that this city suffered a loss running into the hundreds of millions of dollars, as a result of the flood; that private business was hit heavily, and that the latter loss will in turn affect tax receipts and further reduce the municipality's income.

The New York Senator, most Pittsburghers will agree, is talking out of turn when he endeavors to spread the impression that Pittsburgh is so wealthy and in such sound financial shape that it can well afford to pay $16,000,000 for flood dams. We wish we were so well off, but we aren't and Senator COPELAND should not give his fellow Members of the Senate and House a false impression.

As a matter of fact, when Senator COPELAND declares that Pittsburgh should pay a portion of the cost of these reservoirs, he forgets that we will be doing that very thing, whether or not the Federal Government pays the entire construction bill.

The Pittsburgh district is one of the heaviest contributors to the Federal Government. Last year it paid more than $88,000,000 in income, corporation, and other taxes. On that basis, we can assume, therefore, that we will be paying a good share of the construction costs of the nine flood reservoirs proposed in the flood-control bill.

Furthermore, why should one city have to pay for projects whose benefits are unquestionably interstate in nature? Congress did not assess adjoining communities for the protection given them by the Mississippi River flood-control program. It held, and properly so, that a sufficient number of States benefited so that the Federal Government should assume all of the cost.

The same logic applies to the Ohio River program, which will benefit Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky, and other down-river States. We will be one of the larger beneficiaries only because Pittsburgh happens to be at the junction of the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers. But it is wrong to assume that the Federal Government is about to spend $55,000,000 for Pittsburgh's exclusive benefit, as Senator COPELAND seems to think.

We hope the attitude of the Commerce Committee chairman is not the attitude of the majority of Members of the Senate and House, and that they will amend the bill so as to have the Federal Government assume all of the costs of the Ohio River flood reservoirs.

If circumstances permitted, this city probably would be glad to pay some share of the cost of the dams, even though their benefits are interstate and they properly are a Federal undertaking.

But Pittsburgh's finances do not permit it, and if Congress enacts a flood-control bill with the cost-sharing provision attached, we might as well abandon all hopes of early construction of these reservoirs. The program would be stymied, for the simple reason that this district would be unable to raise the $16,000,000 required of it.

In his fight to have the Federal Government pay the entire cost of the reservoirs, we urge Senator JOSEPH P. GUFFEY to make this clear to his fellow Members. Senator COPELAND seems to think that we can raise the sum proposed without any difficulty whatsoever. He either has Pittsburgh confused with some other city or else is completely ignorant of our true financial situation.

PROHIBITION OF PRICE DISCRIMINATIONS

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (S. 3154) making it unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to discriminate in price or terms of sale between purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality, to prohibit the payment of brokerage or commission under certain conditions, to suppress pseudo-advertising allowances, to provide a presumptive measure of damages in certain cases, and to protect the independent merchant, the public whom he serves, and the manufacturer from whom he buys, from exploitation by unfair competitors.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, it is my purpose to try to bring to the attention of the Senate some of the evidence which was adduced before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the so-called Borah-Van Nuys bill. The evidence, as has already appeared, was not limited to that bill, but comprehended several bills of like character, including Senate bill 3154, which is the pending business.

I ought to say at the outset that I am opposed to the pending bill and that the testimony and other evidence to which I intend to refer lead to the conclusion that the bill ought to be amended in very material respects or that it ought not to be passed.

First, let me call attention to the views of the minority, as stated by Mr. CELLER, of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives, from which I read in part, as follows:

> How will the consumer fare under this bill? He will fare illy indeed. Under this bill the housewife will soon find out where the shoe pinches.
> Unfortunately housewives and the consumer generally are not organized. Their voice is not articulate. But retail grocers and the retail druggists, and the wholesalers catering to them, have banded together and have raised a lot of commotion and issued forth reams and reams of propaganda in support of this bill, but no thought have they given to the consumer. Indeed, the consumer should be the main object of our care.
> Dr. Harold G. Moulton, of the Brookings Institution, recently said:
> "This bill, insofar as it would strike at all those who have heretofore been effective in reducing prices, to that extent will raise prices."
> Certainly wages generally have not advanced. They have remained, and will remain for some time to come, fairly stationary. We in Congress should do all in our power to increase the purchasing power of those fairly stationary wages. This bill will make the laborers' dollar buy less by increasing prices. This is readily discernible by its discouragement of "quantity discounts." Large distributors buying larger quantities and telescoping expensive distributive services are able to distribute the essentials of life, as well as many of the luxuries of life, at important reductions in price. They pass on to the consumer these savings which they effect by virtue of quantity discounts and the elimination of service or entire steps in the distributive process unnecessary to the purchaser of necessities.

That is the end of that part of the minority views to which I desire to invite the attention of the Senate.

Probably one of the most impressive witnesses who appeared before the committee was a woman. I want the Senate to take note that I am particularly emphasizing the effect of this measure upon the consumer. Obviously the housewife is as competent as any other witness to testify regarding the subject. Mrs. Virginia Huntley Morrison, of Chicago, representing the Community Round Table of Illinois, appeared to speak in behalf of the housewives of her State. She told how large and impressive is the organization which she represented, stating that it contains 500 different groups having a wide associate membership of several hundred thousand.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. My attention was distracted, and I did not hear some of the introductory remarks the Senator made. I remember he stated there was testimony on several different bills. I am wondering if the testimony to which the Senator now is about to refer applies to the bill now pending.

Mr. AUSTIN. It does.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The hearings to which the Senator is now making reference were hearings on the Borah-Van Nuys bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. They were; but the hearings comprehended testimony upon all the bills of like character. The several bills were referred to by name as well as by subject matter in the testimony, as will be seen.

Among other things, Mrs. Morrison stated:

The food budget has been and always will be our chief concern in relation to the wage earner and those unfortunates, the relief and pension clients—how the smallest amount of cash can be spread over the family's requirements and needs. We are not concerned whether the independent merchants or the chain stores get the business, just so the housewife gets the most in quantity and the best in quality for her dollar. Therefore, we are opposed to any legislation that would increase the cost of foodstuffs.

While I have no legal training, I believe it is easy to see the difference between the Borah-Van Nuys and Copeland bills and the Robinson-Patman and Utterback bills.

Mr. President, I digress to point out that this witness was testifying with reference to the pending measure, as well as the other bills.

From a study of the former group of bills, my understanding is that they would only tighten up the antitrust laws to prevent monopolies and prevent any type of business from having a competitive advantage over other types.

That is, she was referring to the Borah-Van Nuys and Copeland bills.

I do not know whether such legislation is necessary or not, but I suppose the Senators who introduced these bills would not have done so unless they did believe it was necessary.

The Patman-Robinson and Utterback bills, according to my understanding, would go much further. For instance, they would prevent the chain stores from doing a wholesale business by purchasing goods direct from farmers and manufacturers in large quantities and then selling at retail. It would force the chain stores to buy through other wholesalers and middlemen. Of course, anyone can see the middlemen take a profit and their profit would be passed along to the consumers. That would increase the cost of living, and that is our objection to these bills or any legislation that would do this.

Omitting some of her testimony, I come to the following:

Statistics show that about 45 percent of our children of grammar-school age are suffering from malnutrition due to curtailed food values and expenditures. This is not alone confined to relief clients but to the children and families of the wage earner and the masses as a whole. These are the people each of you gentlemen represent. These are the people who depend upon you to recognize their best interests. In the case of relief clients, these people depend upon you gentlemen for their very existence.

Again omitting further of her testimony, I read the following:

The Federal agency—

Referring there to the Federal Trade Commission—found the unnecessarily large spread between the price paid to the producer and the price charged to the consumer was due to excessive middlemen's handling charges and the waste due to faulty handling by the many middlemen.

Our survey shows these excessive charges have been corrected in a great measure by large-scale distribution. Hence it is reasonable to ask, What can be gained by the passing of legislation that will tear down that which has been gained during the past 15 years? Why pass legislation which will subsidize a few middlemen and burden the vast number of consumers with high costs of distribution? Is it fair or wise to penalize the whole public for the doubtful benefit of a favored few?

As I have stated, these questions apply particularly to the provisions in the Robinson-Patman bill and the Utterback bill. We were prepared to oppose the Robinson-Patman bill; but, as you know, it did not come up for a hearing in the regular way before the Senate committee, and therefore we had no chance to voice our objections to measures which we believe would unnecessarily increase the cost of living. To do that would be taxation without representation.

Let me digress long enough to suggest that there is no form of taxation so cruel as the lowering of wages—I mean real wages—or the raising of the cost of living by statute.

Continuing reading:

It should be obvious that the buying public, especially the housewife, has written the answer to the problem. By trading with the chain stores they receive value for their precious dollars. It is value and service which lead them to trade with the chain stores.

After all, are not the housewives the ones who can best decide where they want to spend their money? Have they not a perfect right to make such a choice for themselves?

Again, Mrs. Morrison testified:

Nowhere in the records have I been able to find where the groups who are behind these bills have made a study or offered anything to substitute for that which the consumer-housewife is now getting. Is not the housewife—and the whole consuming public—entitled to consideration in this matter? Which is more important, the housewife, who feeds the families of America, or the middlemen, whose only interest is to make a profit out of foodstuffs, which only increases the cost of living to the housewife and the families of America? I believe the answer is obvious.

Again, she testified:

The Robinson and Patman and Utterback bills would increase costs of goods to the consumers and would destroy much of the progress which has been made toward getting necessities of life to the public not only at lower prices but improved in quality and with sanitary and hygienic methods of handling foodstuffs. If such bills are enacted into law, the public criticism and resentment would naturally be widespread. I hope you gentlemen will consider these facts and hesitate before you disregard the wishes and interests of the housewife on these matters.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has given careful and intimate scrutiny to this problem for weeks. I should be very much interested in his own opinion respecting the effect of the bill upon the cost of living, as commented upon in the testimony he has just read.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, of course, I base my opinion upon the evidence. We have the evidence of marketing and distributing specialists, or distributors who are in active business, both wholesale and retail, both independent and belonging to chains, and every one of them testified that the cost of the necessities of life is somewhere from 10 to 22 percent—various percentages were stated—higher in the case of purchase from the independent store than in the case of purchase from one of the chains or combinations of independent grocers, where the middleman's expense is eliminated and where the goods or food go directly from the producer to the consumer.

The thing almost speaks for itself. A difference of even 2 percent is entitled to our careful consideration, especially in hard times; but a difference that ranges from 10 to 22 percent is one, I think, which should cause us to halt in our tracks.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a further question?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Would the results which the Senator now describes flow from legislation which merely prevented fictitious brokerage and advertising rebates, and which merely required equivalent prices for equivalent purchasers?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, my answer to that would be "no"; but this bill goes far beyond that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I ask the Senator whether any of the various bills that are pending are confined to the particular objectives I have just recited?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I am inclined to believe the Borah-Van Nuys bill is so limited. There is no express limitation in it, but it is of the type of legislation with which we have been acquainted throughout our history. It is general in its nature. It is not new in its administration. It does not undertake to cast into Washington the power of dominating all business, all prices, which the pending bill does do. The Borah-Van Nuys bill also has the merit of utilizing the courts of justice, rather than an administrative body, for the administration of the law. It is general in its scope. It is very much more comprehensive than more specific language would naturally make it; and nearly all those who appeared as witnesses favored that bill. If any legislation is to be enacted here to interfere with the free flow of economic laws, all those who testified, save only two, as I recall—two who had bills of their own which they were promoting—favored the Borah-Van Nuys bill as against any other bill that was pending.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, one further question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont further yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is my understanding that the independent merchants of the country, with whom I substantially sympathize in many of their problems, are interested only in the three objectives which I have previously recited, namely, protection against fictitious brokerage allowances, then protection——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may we not have order in the Chamber?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point is made that there is a want of order. The Chair begs the Members of the Senate to observe order and asks the occupants of the galleries to refrain from conversation, as the echo of the conversation in the galleries permeates the Chamber. The Chair thanks the occupants of the galleries for their consideration.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will start the question over again.

It is my understanding that the independent merchants for whom the proposed legislation is primarily intended are interested in three specific objectives, or at least they think they are: First, protection against fictitious brokerage allowances; second, protection against fictitious advertising allowances; third, protection against discriminating prices as between equivalent buyers.

I can see no objection to any one of those three purposes. Do I understand the Senator to say that the Borah-Van Nuys bill would achieve those purposes and yet be free from the difficulty and the prejudice and the criticism respecting ultimate consumer prices which the Senator has been attributing to the Robinson-Patman bill?

Mr. AUSTIN. The testimony tended to show that. Of course, the bill with which we are dealing had that for an objective. Section 2 of the Clayton Act was designed to prevent unfair price discrimination. Let me read it at this point:

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

That is the general prohibitory part of section 2; but there are certain provisos which I shall now read:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for differences in the cost of selling or transportation, or discrimination in price in the same or different communities made in good faith to meet competition: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers in bona-fide transactions and not in restraint of trade.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. That provision, of course, is retained in the section; and the substantial difference is with respect to the limitation that is sought to be imposed on quantity discriminations. Does the Senator think the Clayton Act has been effective for the accomplishment of the purposes for which it was written?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I must say that, as administered, I do not think it has been; but I think it could have been. Ever since the Van Camp decision I have believed that both the buyer and the seller are affected by that act.

The excuse for not administering it more effectively theretofore was that it was claimed that it did not affect the buyer as well as the seller; but in the Van Camp case, decided in 1929, the Court put an interpretation on the act which, I believe, would have enabled the Federal Trade Commission to put it into effect with the saving clauses in it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to a further question?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. If I understand the reply of the Senator to my former question, it is that the present law is adequate, but that it has not been properly administered. The Senator takes the position that there is really no necessity for further legislation. Is that correct?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, if it were left to me to decide, I should certainly take the position that it is much better for the welfare of the country, for the welfare of all persons concerned in trade and commerce, to add nothing more to the law than is found in the Clayton Act and section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. I think section 2 of the Clayton Act, section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, and the Sherman antitrust law are wholly adequate to take care of unfair discrimination.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator believe that, in order to meet competition in good faith, the manufacturer or the seller should be permitted to sell his product below cost?

Mr. AUSTIN. I should say yes, under certain circumstances. From my personal observation, as well as from much evidence that came before the committee, there are occasions in trade when, if one were not permitted to sell below cost, he would have on his hands a great quantity of sirup, for example, which would perish, or a great quantity of fruit, or other perishable products, foodstuffs of all kinds.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not think any legislation would interfere with such a condition as that. What I ask is, in order to meet competition, should the seller be allowed to sell below cost?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I did not apprehend the point in the question when I answered. That is a very difficult question of ethics, as well as of law. If the competition in business on one side is unfair and is not restrained by any governmental agency, I should like to ask this question in answer to the other: How can a man whose business life depends upon meeting that sort of competition do otherwise than sell below cost?

Mr. LOGAN. If he does it in order to meet legitimate competition, of course, he cannot continue very long, and he not only pulls his own temple down, but he pulls down the temple of all others. In a given community there may be a small dealer, perhaps, who is doing business in the community, and there may be a more powerful concern there, one which sells its products all over the country, and, realizing that the small fellow in the community is going to get some business, the larger concern deliberately goes out to meet competition, and sells goods in the community below cost, repeating what was done in the old days in the sale of petroleum. Should that be allowed? I mean, should any man be allowed to sell his product below cost for the purpose of meeting competition; that is, perhaps, to drive his competitor from the field?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, that is prohibited by law.

Mr. LOGAN. Not by the Clayton Act.

Mr. AUSTIN. It is prohibited by the Clayton Act. I trust the Senator will excuse me for differing.

Mr. LOGAN. In the Clayton Act, as I read it, it is provided that nothing in the act shall prevent one from selling below the standard fixed there in order to meet competition in good faith, which would allow one to sell for whatever he thought proper.

Mr. AUSTIN. Oh, yes, Mr. President, but that is the difference between the question asked and the law. "In good faith to meet competition" is something different from underselling one's opponent to drive him out of business. That is the point that is prohibited by the law. The Clayton Act was designed to prevent such unfair competition as that. The moment the competition enters the field of driving any one out of business, eliminating competition, or unreasonably reducing competition, a transgression of the law occurs which can be stopped by a cease and desist order, under the act.

Mr. LOGAN. The vice of the Clayton Act is that after making that provision it immediately exempts from the provisions of the law those who sell in a community in order to meet competition in good faith; and that is where the trouble is. There could always be competition in good faith, and then a seller could sell to the people in a community at prices lower than those at which he sells to people in some other community. In fact, such sellers can drive a competitor out of business in one community by lowering prices, and then increasing the prices of the products elsewhere in order to make up the loss. I do not think that ought to be allowed, although I realize the Senator is entitled to his own opinion.

Mr. AUSTIN. Answering on the assumption in the question, of a purpose to drive the other fellow out, I would agree with the learned Senator from Kentucky, with whom I find myself in agreement so often. I would not approve of that, and that is not my purpose in what I have to say here.

When I say that I think the Clayton Act is adequate to meet a condition of which the Senator speaks, it is because the Clayton Act in the prohibitory clause provides as follows:

> It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce * * * either directly or indirectly to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities * * * where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition.

Mr. LOGAN. There is a proviso there, however, that if it is necessary in order to meet competition, they may do so.

Mr. AUSTIN. Oh, yes; it takes care of the intent in good faith. I do not think the business of this country as a general thing, or even to a great extent, is on a cutthroat basis, that drives the independent out, and builds up the combination, or the chain-store system. I became convinced of that after listening to the statistics compiled by the Federal Trade Commission on the subject, and after listening to the testimony of men who are constantly engaged in studying distribution and marketing. I intended to refer to that later, but I will do so now.

Mr. LOGAN. May I interrupt the Senator once more, and then I will not interfere with the thread of his thought further at this time?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] correctly stated the objectives of the Patman bill and of the other bills. I ask the Senator from Vermont whether it is not true that everyone who appeared before our committee, where the Senator was so kind in helping with the examination, and is it not true that everyone who has appeared before the House committee, and the number is legion, has said that the Clayton Act should be amended, and were they not in favor of amending the Clayton Act, except those who were opposed to any legislation on the subject?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator repeat his question?

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will recall that Mr. Dunn, apparently a very well-informed lawyer, who appeared in opposition to the Robinson bill, made a splendid argument before the committee, insisting that the Clayton Act ought to be amended. Then Mr. Sammons, of New York, who also is opposed to the Robinson bill, stated that it is his opinion that the Clayton Act should be amended. So far as I know, except the representatives of some of those with large purchasing power, everyone, without an exception, insisted that there should be an amendment. The only disagreement was as to some of the language in the bill. I think the Senator will remember that that is correct. At least the record, I think, will bear me out in that.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I think the witnesses referred to by the Senator from Kentucky did so testify; but there were something like 27 witnesses, and a great number of them made this qualifying statement: "If any law on this subject must be passed, we prefer the Borah-Van Nuys bill to the Robinson-Patman bill." And they gave their reasons for the statement.

Mr. LOGAN. That is quite true as to those at the last hearing. Of course, a large majority testifying before the House committee took a different attitude, as I recall. But are not the objectives of the Borah-Van Nuys bill exactly the same as the objectives of the Robinson bill, and is not the only disagreement as to the language used in reaching the objectives?

Mr. AUSTIN. I assumed in the hearing that the objectives were the same, and I am inclined to think that the testimony tended to show they were the same. But one of the authors of one of the bills is on his feet now, and perhaps he will state whether the objectives are the same.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I think the objectives of the two bills are the same. The differences between the two proposals I will discuss a little later, but I think both bills seek to accomplish the same general purpose. That is my opinion.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Vermont a question?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Am I to gather from the colloquy between the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Kentucky that the Robinson bill prohibits the sale of a commodity at any time below its cost of production?

Mr. AUSTIN. I am impressed by the testimony with the idea that the bill was so interpreted.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky if that is the fact?

Mr. LOGAN. No, Mr. President; that is not true. There is nothing in the Robinson bill which prohibits the sale of any commodity at any price at which a seller desires to dispose of it; but there is a provision against his selling, for example, to the Senator from Michigan at one price and to the Senator from Vermont at another price under the same conditions and the quality of the goods being the same. However, so far as the Robinson bill is concerned, the seller may sell at any price he desires. The purpose of the bill is to compel the treatment of all customers exactly alike when the same situation applies to all of them.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Senator will further permit me, I wish to ask another question. Would that apply equally to a customer in the United States and a customer out of the United States?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think it applies to a customer out of the United States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator does not think the provision he is talking about would prevent sales of surplus products abroad at lower prices?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not. As I recall, the provisions of the bill are confined specifically to the United States and possessions of the United States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is there any doubt about that?

Mr. BORAH. I think not. Will the Senator yield to permit me to say one word?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Kentucky has stated what I understand to be the fundamental principle of both bills, and that is to compel all customers to be treated alike, specifying that if an advantage or a favor or a commission is granted to A, the seller must be prepared to grant it to B. That is the fundamental principle underlying both measures; and I do not see how there can be any objection to that fundamental principle. There may be a difference of view as to how to arrive at that objective, or as to the better way to arrive at it; but that is what we are seeking to do by all these measures. Is that not so?

Mr. LOGAN. That is exactly my understanding.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, if that principle were written into the bill so that all the circumstances of the different buyers could be considered in sizing up whether the circumstances of one buyer were similar to the circumstances of another buyer, we should not have this objection to the bill. The difficulty, however, is that the bill does not permit any adjustment to locality or any adjustment to standards of living in the markets where the goods are sold to a certain set of purchasers or to a certain purchaser. There is no flexibility about the bill. It is hard and fast and fixes the price.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator again yield to me?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I shall be very glad if the Senator will point out where there is any provision in the Borah-Van Nuys bill or the Robinson bill or any bill pending in the Senate that fixes the price or has a tendency to fix the price of any commodity.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the most casual reading of the pending bill shows that the outstanding characteristic of it is that the Federal Trade Commission, an authority in Washington, shall have power absolutely to determine the minimum price which may be charged for food. That is the outstanding feature of the bill. Of course, it is covered up by a great many words, and it is carefully concealed in the proposition of quantity limits; but it is there. That is the very, very important point in the bill.

If I can get a chance to read from Mr. Dunn's statement, I wish to do so. He was referred to, and I have been interrupted several times without having had the opportunity to let him answer for himself.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him again?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; I yield to the Senator; but I should like to make my statement consecutive.

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot let the Senator's statement go unchallenged. I make the statement now, as one believing he is competent to read simple language and understand it, that the Senator from Vermont is wholly mistaken; that the Federal Trade Commission has no authority under any of these bills to fix the price of anything; and I shall rest my contention on that statement.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is the Senator from Vermont going to read from what Mr. Dunn said?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to read from the Borah-Van Nuys bill. Mr. Dunn was particularly addressing himself to particular phases of the bill which I had the honor to offer. I should like to have permission to read two paragraphs from the Borah-Van Nuys bill in order that we may see the pertinency or impertinency of the remarks of Mr. Dunn with reference to the measure.

I am now reading from the bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] and myself, the Borah-Van Nuys bill. The bill is contained in two paragraphs. I read as follows:

SEC. 2. It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to be a party to, or assist in, any transaction of sale or contract to sell which discriminates to his knowledge against competitors of the purchaser, in that any discount, rebate, allowance, or advertising service charge is granted to the purchaser over and above any discount, rebate, allowance, or advertising service charge available at the time of such transaction to said competitors in respect of a sale of goods of like grade, quality, and quantity.

That, Mr. President, seeks to accomplish just one thing, and that is that whatever is granted to one customer in the way of rebates or commissions or advertising charges, and so forth, shall be available to any other customer who deals with the seller. That is all the bill seeks to accomplish. I do not think anyone, Mr. Dunn or anyone else, objected to that.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I did not intend to read anything which related to that.

Mr. BORAH. Pardon me.

Mr. AUSTIN. The interrogatories that prompted my reference to this matter related to the Robinson-Patman bill, the pending business. Reference was made to Mr. Dunn, and comment was made upon his probity and learning and special knowledge of this subject. I therefore wish to point out that Mr. Dunn is opposed to the Robinson-Patman bill, in spite of the fact that it contains a good purpose. I think we are all agreed on the good purpose.

The address from which I shall read is not contained in the record. I shall read from an address which Mr. Dunn made in the course of a radio debate with Representative PATMAN relating to the Patman bill. The address was made on April 21, 1936, since the hearings; and, among other things, Mr. Dunn makes this fourth point:

This being so, the third fact is that this bill has a constructive purpose in its antitrust law conception. Therefore the question it presents is whether it makes a due amendment without any undue effect. For its good purpose will not save it if it enacts a law having a bad effect. Consequently, it does not suffice in justification of this bill to make eloquent and emotional appeals about its good purpose. Rather, what the public wants and is entitled to know is how this bill, if enacted, will actually affect the three principal parties to it. They are the buyer, the seller, and the consumer.

It is clear that to be sound this bill must enact a law which is just to each of these three parties, and which has a due regard for their unquestioned rights under it. Which rights are these? The buyer has the right to have this bill enact an effective Federal law against unfair price discrimination. The seller has the right to demand that this enacted law shall not be unjust or injurious to him. And the consumer has the paramount right to demand that this law shall not prevent economic price reduction as distinguished from wrongful price discrimination.

In appraising this bill from the standpoint of the consumer it is necessary to keep the following fundamental considerations in mind: First, this bill enacts a law regulating the prices of the essential commodities of life which every man, woman, and child in the country must have and which the poor must buy. Secondly, this bill prevents price reduction if and to the extent it involves wrongful price discrimination. Consequently, it must sharply and unquestionably distinguish between the wrongful price discrimination which it properly prohibits and the economic price reduction which it must permit. For a national law cannot be tolerated which is effective to prevent the economic price reduction of the essential commodities of life and thus artificially to enhance the cost of living to the people of the United States.

That is Mr. Dunn's opinion about the pending bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I am sure that that statement cannot be applied with any relevancy to the bill of which I am one of the authors, and I do not see how it can be applied to the other bill. I do not know where the Senator can find the language which justifies the argument that the bill prevents price reduction.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Vermont a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. AUSTIN. I have not answered the question just propounded by the Senator from Idaho, but I will also take the question of the Senator from Arkansas now.

Mr. ROBINSON. The question relates to the same subject. Referring to the bill under consideration, what is the language in the bill which expressly or impliedly gives to the Federal Trade Commission the power to fix prices or which prevents reductions in prices?

Mr. AUSTIN. The following language, I think, will answer both questions. It begins with the word "Provided", at the bottom of page 5 and extends to page 6, and is as follows:

Provided, however, That the Federal Trade Commission may, after due investigation and hearing to all interested parties, fix and establish quantity limits, and revise the same as it finds necessary, as to particular commodities or classes of commodities, where it finds that available purchasers in greater quantities are so few as to render differentials on account thereof unjustly discriminatory or promotive of monopoly in any line of commerce; and the foregoing shall then not be construed to permit differentials based on differences in quantities greater than those so fixed and established.

Mr. President, if it is not apparent to everyone who hears that language that that is a price-fixing measure, then there is no use trying to construe such language. Any man in business who finds it impossible by virtue of the Federal Trade Commission's order to sell his commodities for less than the price fixed by the Federal Trade Commission has his price fixed.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will ask the Senator to let me finish the thought. I can hardly express an idea before it is split in the middle. The reason why the housewife has been able to buy at chain stores for less money than at the independent grocer and druggist is because the large chain store has had the capacity to buy more food and drugs for less money than has the independent, who has to pay the cost of an intermediary in the purchase. Let the Federal Trade Commission come in and say, "Here, you cannot buy at a price below this price, and the way we are going to stop your doing it is by preventing quantity differentials on what you may buy." That is the soul of his purchase; that is the heart of his contract; the consideration that he gave for the low price was perhaps a 6 months' purchase, covering a vast quantity of materials, perhaps all the materials the seller had to sell, assuring him security, simplifying his costs by going to him to buy instead of having the seller come and drum him for trade. In other words, the price is fixed whenever the Federal Trade Commission steps in and says, "You cannot make use of your purchasing power by buying on a quantity basis."

Then look at the impracticability of the provision which contains the clause "available purchasers * * * are so few as to render differentials on account thereof unjustly discriminatory." Assume, as the evidence tended to show, that in New England there are only 2 chain stores and in New York there are 200; what an exposure to arbitrary, unfair, unjust, and damaging control by the Government there is contained in that provision which gives to the Federal Trade Commission freedom to say that 2 are too few in number when compared with a neighborhood just a little way off where there are 200.

Of course, it is possible to drive the chain store out of business and to set up the other method of distribution by a statute, but, while engaging in such a performance, let us think of the real person who pays the cost, and that is the consumer. I wish to call attention to some of the considerations respecting the consumer.

It was testified during the hearings before the House Judiciary Committee that the consumers of the Nation would have to bear an annual increase of $750,000,000 on their food bill alone as the price of enacting this measure. That statement has not been countered by any evidence, and, in my opinion, it cannot be gainsaid. It is founded upon a report of the Federal Trade Commission made after thorough examination of the situation. That report which was the result of a survey contained the following expression:

> It is quite as important from the consumer's standpoint that costs of technical production be lowered as that cost of so-called distribution be reduced. But while there still remains much to be accomplished in the former direction, greater success has been attained than in the latter. Quantity production, which has been enormously increased, and severely scientific methods which have prevailed in many fields of production, particularly of manufacturing, have been, among others, factors in lowering unit cost. * * *
> The costs of distribution, on the other hand, are for many food commodities inordinately high. * * * The costs of distribution * * * form no inconspicuous part of the final price which the consumer has to pay for the foods which he purchases, and these costs, together with attending wastes of foods * * * with reference to wholesaling, are unnecessarily high.
> The delivery of goods from the wholesaler's or jobber's place of sale to the store of the retailer is a matter of very serious import.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator must recognize that the bill under consideration takes account of and permits quantity differentials justified by differences in cost whether of transportation or of distribution; so that the argument from which he is reading does not appear to me fairly to support the contention that the passage of this bill would mean an added burden to the consumer. The object of the bill is to prevent large buyers from taking unfair advantage of independents by securing terms that are out of proportion to the differences in cost, thus enabling them to destroy their competitors and to monopolize the market.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. It seems to me, if the Senator will permit one more statement before he proceeds, that the whole force of the Senator's argument leads to the conclusion that he is justifying monopoly in the sale and distribution of products.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, any Senator within the sound of my voice, of course, may make the inferences he chooses from what I have to say, but I wish to say now, since that point has been raised, that I am not for monopoly in the distribution of food and clothing and that the whole purpose of my remarks is to preserve, if possible, competition. If I could have my way there would be free economic play, full competition; there would not be a government stepping in to help out one phase of distribution at the expense of another phase; but there would be left these wonderful methods of distribution and perfect freedom to fight it out in the present state of the law and on economic laws as they have done heretofore, and to the benefit of the consumer.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. How long does the Senator think the little man, the independent dealer, would last if he were left absolutely to the mercy of the large dealer without regulation by any Government authority; and is it not a fact that the whole trend of conditions is toward monopoly and that that has prompted the enactment of regulatory legislation?

Mr. AUSTIN. I say "no" to that question. On the contrary, the evidence which can be read without spending more than one night in the reading shows there has developed in this country a keen and efficient method of distribution, a keen competition between those who distribute through wholesalers and middlemen and those who distribute directly from the producer to the consumer.

More than that, within each one of these branches of distribution there is keen competition between those who are fighting for the same market, chain stores in competition with chain stores, wholesalers in competition with wholesalers. The evidence with respect to the possible injury of the independent grocer or other small store is that they are increasing in strength, that they are improving in their capacity to handle the business of retail distribution, rather than the contrary. That is repeated by witness after witness who has better advantage of knowing the facts than we do, and after a careful survey.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator will agree, will he not, that witness after witness representing the independent businessmen testified that unless they have some protection such as is designed by these bills they cannot remain in business?

Mr. AUSTIN. I think I could not quite follow the Senator from Idaho to that extent. The testimony, as I recall it, was to the effect that the small merchant, the independent, is faring by comparison better than is the retailer in the chain stores. If I get to it, I shall produce the evidence on that point and the statistics which establish the fact.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. KING. I ask for information in view of the statement made by the Senator a moment ago. Does the Senator interpret the bill under consideration as a prohibition against direct sales from the manufacturer to the consumer? Is there anything that would interrupt a transaction between a manufacturer or producer of a commodity, no matter what it is, whether big or little, and the ultimate consumer, so that the manufacturer or producer would be forced to sell through wholesalers, through brokerage firms, and so on, in order to reach the ultimate consumer?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do not so interpret the provisions of the bill.

Mr. KING. If it is susceptible of that interpretation, I should be opposed to it—that is, if there is any provision in the bill which would prohibit direct sales.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I had not finished my discussion of the consumers' interest in the pending measure. I invite attention to the testimony of Mr. McNair, teacher in the Harvard school of business. This man's lifework has been the study of distribution costs. He said, among other things:

> It seems to me that in considering these bills your committee should give careful attention to the fact that consumer purchasing power must be preserved and that a reduction in the cost of distribution is fully as important in the preservation and the increasing of consumer's purchasing power as the reduction in the cost of manufacture.

That is almost in the same terms as the report of the Federal Trade Commission:

> I think the salvation of the capitalistic system depends upon getting merchandise into the hands of the consumers at lower and lower prices, and one of the great advantages in the reduction of distribution costs is achieved by large-scale distribution. I believe such operations will place merchandise in the hands of the consumers at lower and lower prices. I am in agreement that there have been certain abuses. I do not condone them. I think legislation may be called for to correct them. But I believe your committee should be extremely careful in recommending such legislation to see that no injury is done to the consumer's purchasing power, because that is the most important step in recovery.

That particular part of Mr. McNair's testimony refers to the question asked by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I do not understand how it can be contended that if we through law impose upon the large distributor the obligation to treat all customers alike that is in any way interfering with free competition.

Mr. AUSTIN. There could not be any competition if by statute we fixed the prices to a common level all over the United States.

Mr. BORAH. I am not proposing to do that.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is the effect of a Federal statute.

Mr. BORAH. I am not proposing to fix any prices. I propose to say to the large dealers, "You may fix the price at whatever you may choose to fix it, but when you fix it you must give A the same benefit you give B."

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; and a statute like that would be like a statute that declared that one could worship God in any way he liked, provided it was according to the Protestant faith. By such a law as that we would fix the price level all over the United States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Am I correctly informed that Professor McNair also stated it to be his belief that the Borah-Van Nuys bill safeguards the consumers' interests to a substantially greater degree than does the Robinson-Patman bill, and that he had no substantial objection to the Borah-Van Nuys bill?

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator from Michigan is correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Senator will permit me, I do not think that point can be too often emphasized, because I am in a position of wanting to reach the precise objective which we have repeatedly stated, but I do not want to reach a lot of objectives which are not in contemplation in those limited purposes. I do not want to create more problems than I solve.

Mr. AUSTIN. I thank the Senator for what he has said because I think he grasps the objectives at which I am aiming.

I wish to continue my reference to the amount of injury to the consumer which the passage of this bill would entail. Mr. McNair said further, among other things:

> The first point that it is essential to bear in mind is that roughly half of the consumer's dollar spent for merchandise bought over the counter of a retail store goes to cover costs of distribution, or marketing. In other words, manufacturers' selling and advertising costs, wholesaling costs, and retailing costs ordinarily are just as large a part of the final dollar of sales as are manufacturing and production costs. Not more than half the consumer's dollar really goes to cover the labor and other costs involved in the manufacture of goods.
> The point has been made most effectively by the studies of the Brookings Institution that the future progress of the United States depends very largely on placing goods and services in the hands of final consumers at lower and lower costs in order that the consumer's dollar may go further. This is what is meant by increasing consumer purchasing power. Now any saving in the distribution-cost half of the consumer's dollar increases consumer purchasing power just as much as a saving in the manufacturing-cost half of the dollar. If, through improved distribution methods, consumers are able to buy goods for 10 or 15 cents less on the dollar of sales than they can buy them through other channels of distribution, then that 10- or 15-cent saving is an increase in consumer purchasing power. It releases that much purchasing power for the buying of other goods, and the making of those goods affords employment to additional persons that otherwise would not have jobs.
> That the 15 cents of consumer saving shown by the figures to which I referred is in no sense an exaggeration is attested by the Final Report of the Federal Trade Commission on the Chain-Store Investigation, in which it is stated with reference to retail drug prices that "the geometric average of chain and independent prices, when weighted by chain and when weighted by independent volume, indicates that the prices of independents are from 14.527 percent (Detroit) to 22.72 percent (Washington) higher than those of the chains in the four cities studied by the Commission * * *."

Just think of that—roughly from 14 percent to 22 percent higher in the independents than in the chain stores.

> Such savings are made possible by the development of large-scale methods of distribution in the direction of combining or telescoping the wholesale and retail functions under one overhead. The large chain-store company goes direct to manufacturers instead of buying to any great extent from middlemen.

Then the witness goes on with examples.

This testimony is quite voluminous, and I regret that I feel obliged to read so much of it here. I should not do so were it not for the fact that the testimony was not printed and did not arrive until this morning.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I ask whose testimony the Senator was just reading?

Mr. AUSTIN. I was just reading from Mr. McNair's testimony.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is nowhere contended, is it, by Professor McNair or any of the rest of the witnesses, that it is necessary to maintain the privilege of fictitious discounts in order to maintain these consumer advantages?

Mr. AUSTIN. Not at all.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Therefore, a measure directly aimed at the prevention of fictitious discounts and discriminatory discounts would not be objectionable from the standpoint the Senator argues, nor would it fall under the indictment he announces?

Mr. AUSTIN. Not at all, Mr. President.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And it is possible to have legislation confined to those particular objectives?

Mr. AUSTIN. These witnesses thought so. They testified that, in their opinion, the Borah-Van Nuys bill would do that.

The statement I made here that I should prefer no legislation to any that is before us represents only my own opinion, expressed in response to a question here. I believe there would be a greater benefit to the consumer from leaving the Clayton Act just exactly as it is than from changing it at all; but that is only my opinion. I am trying to adhere to the question pending before the Senate, and to apply to this bill the evidence which came before the committee; and it should be remembered that out of the 27 witnesses who appeared before the committee, not one of them favored the Robinson-Patman bill—a most amazing situation.

I have the figures of the division. Twenty-seven witnesses testified, and of the entire group not one testified in favor of the Robinson-Patman bill. Twenty-one either testified in favor of the Borah-Van Nuys bill or stated that if some bill is to be enacted, it is the least objectionable. Of the remaining six, two opposed all bills, two preferred bills of their own, and two made no reference to any bill.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Of course, the hearing was on the so-called Borah-Van Nuys bill; but at the hearings in the House on the original Robinson-Patman bill a great volume of witnesses, representative men from all over the United States, testified in favor of that bill. I think that is a true statement, is it not?

Mr. AUSTIN. I believe that is correct. As a matter of fact, I believe I have seen it stated, although I do not know from observation, that there was substantially no hearing of those opposed to the bill before the House committee; so we have the strange set-up here of a report of hearings in the House for the bill, and a report of hearings in the Senate against the bill.

Among other things, Mr. McNair said:

I have devoted some 15 years to a study of retail distribution, and I am convinced that retail distribution by the chain stores has built up their business by serving the consumer better than he would otherwise have been served. I see no point in jumping on the chain stores for something you think they might do, and open the door to the manufacturer to go ahead and fix his prices.

Again he said:

I think the chains have contributed to the higher standards of living. Increased purchasing power has made it possible for the consumer to have 10 or 15 cents more of his dollar.

Again:

There are a number of studies that have been made by the Federal Trade Commission of various independent organizations in Chicago and elsewhere, comparing the prices of chains and units, not just "loss leader" items but covering a wide range, and they all indicate that chains sell at lower prices than independents. There are surveys that show a range of anywhere from 6 or 7 percent up to as high as 22 percent in the city of Washington, in the drug trade, by the Federal Trade Commission.

Again he says:

I have no objection to measures which undertake to enforce proper standards, but I do object to measures which rob the consumer of the benefits he can receive through large-scale methods of distribution, which is one of our most serious problems. Large-scale distribution reduces the cost of distribution and increases the purchasing power of the consumer. I do not like to see the consumer robbed of the benefit of that. I think there is a sharp distinction between the kind of bigness which becomes big through price fixing and monopolistic practices and that which grows by means of competition and giving the consumer superior service in the benefits of that competition.

Now, let me call attention to the testimony of a practical merchant, Paul H. Nystrom. He is also professor of marketing at Columbia University, but he has been engaged in the retail business, either directly or indirectly. He says:

I mean directly in an official way—for nearly 40 years. I am also president of Limited Price Variety Stores Association, an association made up of chains, voluntary chains, and independent retailers.

So he knows both views of the same matter.

With respect to the consumer's interest, he says:

It is inevitable, in my opinion, that if S. 3154 is passed retail prices must rise. That seems to me must be the purpose behind the bill. That must be the reason why certain proponents desire it passed. That must be the reason for the inclusion of certain provisions which go much further than merely to prevent unjustified discrimination.

Mr. Nystrom pictured the various methods of distribution in a very clear manner, as follows:

The major distribution methods in this country exist in many variations, but there are two major types. One is sale through wholesalers or middlemen who sell to retailers, who in turn sell to consumers. As against that is the other, which is sale directly to the retailer, large or small, but generally large, who can take such quantities as the manufacturer prefers to dispose of. These two are the major channels or methods. They have been in conflict for more than 25 years. They have fought each other to a standstill.

I am of the opinion that the department stores reached their peak in about 1926. There has been no material growth in their line since that time. There is no evidence that they will continue to grow much more. There may be a slight growth, but it does not appear that it will be important.

The mail-order houses apparently reached their peak in 1919 and 1920. We will always have mail-order houses in this country, but the possibility of any large growth among them is very slight.

The chain stores were the last to appear. They grew very rapidly in the twenties. They probably grew too fast for their own good. They grew like mushrooms, and they reached their peak in 1929. It remains to be seen whether their growth can be resumed, but I think it is very doubtful.

There are figures available in the census of 1933 showing that the proportion of chain stores in that year had increased over 1929. I do not think that is sound evidence that the chain stores grew in that interval. The most logical assumption, in my opinion, is that by and large the chain stores have enjoyed their most important recent growth from the sale of perishable goods, and when the depression came those sales declined and the number of chain stores decreased. I would not be surprised, therefore, if the next census, that of 1935, will show that chain stores represent a smaller percentage of the total retail service than in 1933.

Omitting some, I come to this:

These various distributing systems are in keen competition. From the public standpoint that seems to be a very desirable thing. We are now benefiting from a better retail service than ever before, and better than what is available anywhere else in the world.

Later he testified:

The provision for wholesale differentials, which is in the Robinson-Patman bill, would, if availed of, force the manufacturer to allow wholesalers a discount which would place the chain stores and other large independent distributors at a decided disadvantage.

Mr. Wheeler Sammons, an executive of the Institute of Distribution, testified at large upon the injury to the consumer. I cannot refer to all I should like to refer to. He made a similar claim, that the savings to the consumer as a result of sales through the chain store direct to the consumer was from 10 to 20 cents of the consumer's dollar. Among other things, he said:

Mr. Chairman, I would, for the purposes of the record, like to recall attention to certain figures mentioned by Senator BORAH, I believe, in regard to wages and expenses in chain stores in comparison with expenses and wages paid by independent distributors. It should be pointed out that the Government figures relating to proprietor-owned stores do not include the compensation taken by the proprietor, while in the case of the chain stores the compensation of the manager is, of course, included. Sixty-odd percent of the stores in this country sell but $10,000 or less a year. If you add the figure mentioned—I believe 20 percent—as expenses, the percentage, only $35 a week would be for the proprietor of such a store, you will see it as at least another 20 percent, making 40 percent or more in all, or twice what I believe was mentioned as the chain-store levy on the consumer.

During the depression the consumers were forced to patronize chains more heavily to hold down expenses, which accounts for the better proportionate showing of the chain stores. You will find now, however, a greater proportionate increase in independent stores' sales now, for people normally disregard savings often for convenience and other factors. There is a place for both always.

Mr. Sammons testified as follows:

The Robinson-Patman bill, Senator, eliminates quantity discounts in practical effect—it just adds that the elimination must be without discrimination. The consumer is to be raided without discrimination, in other words.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BARBOUR. A great many people have written me in respect to this matter of differentials in discounts. In all of the bills there is a parity as far as the differential of discount is concerned, in this respect, that a manufacturer or a distributor selling to customer A a certain article has to make the same quantity discount that he makes to customer B buying the same amount of the same article. Is that a correct statement?

Mr. AUSTIN. That is not correct. If that were so, there would not be this protest, probably, with respect to that control of quantity limits. If the bill provided that the same discount should be given to all who purchased the same quantity, that would be a wholly different thing from the proposition now before us.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, if I may interrupt again, that situation is of paramount importance, and I do not think I am betraying any confidence—I am perfectly willing to ask the questions when the Senators themselves are present—when I say that I have asked the same question of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], and I was assured that while any net price could be charged for one cap manufactured in Newark and a different net price charged for a dozen caps, and still a different price for a gross, it would be necessary to make the same net price to two or more customers buying a like quality of product in like amount. The Senator's statement to me that that is not so casts a very different light on the whole subject, because in that field has come the greatest protest that has been lodged with me.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, let me call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to page 6 of the bill, line 8, where it is provided:

> And the foregoing shall then not be construed to permit differentials based on differences in quantities greater than those so fixed and established.

To what does that refer? That refers to an order made in Washington to take effect in California, in Burlington, Vt., in Newark, N. J., anywhere and everywhere all over the United States, if the person upon whom the order bears had business in those places. Disregarding all the circumstances, disregarding the local merchant's set-up, his cost of doing business, and the competitive factors he encounters in his own locality, which the other man off somewhere else does not encounter, disregarding all of those things, the fixing of the minimum quantity or the maximum quantity by the Federal Trade Commission fixes a dead level of price. Let me read the part of the bill which shows that:

> That the Federal Trade Commission may, after due investigation and hearing to all interested parties, fix and establish quantity limits, and revise the same as it finds necessary, as to particular commodities or classes of commodities, where it finds that available purchasers in greater quantities are so few as to render differentials on account thereof unjustly discriminatory or promotive of monopoly in any line of commerce.

Take the case where there may be 2 chain stores in one district and 200 in another district. There is a situation where this tremendous power may be exercised here at Washington to fix one price in one place and another price in another place by means of fixing the quantity limit and changing it up or down from time to time. In other words, is not the Robinson-Patman bill an extension of the N. R. A.? That question has threaded all through the testimony before the committee. Many of these practical businessmen and these marketing and distributing specialists testified that in all probability the bearing of this bill on business would be the same as the bearing of the N. R. A. on business, namely, fixing prices.

I now call attention to a statement filed by the secretary of the National Voluntary Groups Institute, and vice president of the Independent Grocers Alliance Distributing Co., and I wish to say in passing that a great percentage of the witnesses who appeared before the subcommittee represented independent dealers. They were by no means all representing chain stores. A large number of them were independents. I read:

> What would be the immediate effect of enacting this bill?—The immediate result of enacting such a measure would be—
> (1) A material increase in the cost of living to consumers, particularly to those of low and moderate incomes.
> (2) The elimination of stabilized production which so often makes it possible for manufacturers, particularly small ones, to produce goods for large buyers during the off-peak season, thereby lowering prices to all buyers and consumers; and the emphasis of "peaks and valleys" of production, with attendant seasonal lay-offs of labor.
> (3) The freezing of the price level, with much greater attendant advantage in the long run to large buyers than to small ones.
> (4) The subsidizing of the middleman, at the expense of a vastly larger but vocally less powerful group, the consumers.
> (5) Harassing bureaucratic control over industry by the Federal Trade Commission, similar to that exercised by the N. R. A.
> (6) Unwarranted interference with business, in direct contrast with the President's promise of a "breathing spell" to business.

I come now to another question which this witness answered:

> Question. Do chain stores sell for less?
> Answer. Yes; both according to the experience of most consumers and in fact.
> Average, year-in-and-year-out experience, and not specific instances, must, of course, supply the fair answer to this question. In an investigation of retail prices in various types of business made through the Federal Trade Commission, Uncle Sam, himself, found that chain grocery prices are 8.1 percent lower, on the average, and chain drug stores prices 12.5 percent lower than the retail prices of independent establishments competing with such chain stores. These figures indicate that chains bring to consumers, by way of direct savings to the thrifty, about $776,000,000 a year.

There is another group of people who are vitally affected, vitally interested, and that is the farmer group. Chester Gray, who is well known, possibly, to every Senator, and who probably has the confidence of every Senator, representing the American Farm Bureau Federation, on March 30, 1936, filed a statement from which I read the following:

> On the general question of legislation, such as is contained in the Robinson bill, S. 3154, and in the Patman and Utterback measures on the House side, as well as in S. 4171 by Senators BORAH and VAN NUYS, all of which measures are generally described as being "price discrimination" bills, the approach of the federation is that of analyzing these bills, particularly in relation to their effects on retail prices. In this connection the report by Senator LOGAN on the Robinson measure says: "In forbidding its (economy) use, and foregoing its benefits, the public is but paying a willing price for its freedom from monopoly control." This is a virtual confession that the effect of the measure upon which the report by Senator LOGAN was written will be to raise retail prices and that the public will be willing to pay higher retail prices as a method of getting rid of monopolistic control.

I omit a portion and come to the following:

> The public is fairly well protected under present situations which relate to retail trades in the competitive practices which are now in effect. Too much legislation, or the enactment of a bill of too severe a character in strait jacketing the distribution agencies, corporate or cooperative as the case may be, might be expected to make the consumers, in which agriculture is part, pay penalties in higher prices which are not now required to be paid.
> It may be doubted that the agricultural cooperatives would desire to be limited in quotations of price so that if a quotation was given to one customer, slight or no variety would be permitted in quoting the same commodity to another customer, where local trade or other conditions might necessitate a difference in price quotations if the business is to be retained. Indeed, agricultural cooperatives desire that if the general type of legislation under discussion is to be enacted, such as is contained in the Borah-Van Nuys measure, S. 4171, it should be made somewhat clearer in regard to prohibition of discounts, advertising allowances, and similar devices which if given to one customer and denied to another places the latter at a disadvantage.
> Accordingly the following suggestion is presented as an amendment to be incorporated at the proper place in S. 4171:
> "It shall be unlawful for any person as seller, buyer, broker, agent, or otherwise, to be a party to any transaction of sale that includes or results in the payment by or for the seller of broker's fees or commissions to any person directly or indirectly employed or controlled by the buyer."

The National Cooperatives' Council was also represented at the hearings. Mr. Miller, representing the council, testified as follows:

> Because of our interest in such legislation our council at its annual meeting last January endorsed the Robinson-Patman bill. Some time after that, however, we first learned that on January 16, which was after our annual meeting had adjourned, the subcommittee of the Senate had reported out the bill and had interpreted some of its provisions. Upon learning of that, copies of the bill were sent to the member organizations, and immediately there were protests received.
> We feel that the business of the cooperatives would be seriously handicapped, resulting in tremendous losses to farmer members. One of the major evils we saw is that some of our cooperatives in

New England may be selling in 50 markets, while other milk cooperatives may be selling in 150 markets, and still others in several hundred markets. If in any one of those markets a situation developed where there were reduced prices, under the terms of the other bill, as interpreted, the cooperatives would either have to be forced to withdraw from that market and also withdraw from others, or would be compelled to make reductions in all other markets, which would run into many millions of dollars of losses to the farmers and those cooperatives.

There is much more of importance that this witness testified to, but I have not the time to read it.

Mr. President, I have a letter from the National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation, dated April 29, 1936, which I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

THE NATIONAL COOPERATIVE MILK PRODUCERS' FEDERATION,
Washington, D. C., April 29, 1936.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We would like to call your attention to the harmful effect which certain provisions of the Robinson-Patman bill, now being considered in the Senate, would have on the operations of our farmer-owned and farmer-controlled cooperative marketing associations.

With the principal objectives of the bill, which are directed against the elimination of false brokerage allowances and false advertising allowances, we are in full accord. Other provisions of the bill, however, would be destructive to cooperative marketing of agricultural products.

Section 2 (a) of the bill requires that the same price be charged by sellers to all of their customers for goods of the same grade and quality. Many of our large cooperatives sell milk, butter, cheese, and other dairy products in hundreds of different markets. The Dairymen's League Cooperative Association, Inc., with 35,000 farmer members, sells milk and cream in more than 150 markets in New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey; the Pure Milk Association of Chicago, with approximately 16,000 farmer members, sells milk and cream in about 15 markets in Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin; Land O'Lakes Creameries, Inc., sells butter, cheese, evaporated milk, and other dairy products in practically every large market east of Minneapolis. Land O'Lakes Creameries, Inc., is a federation of farmer-owned and farmer-controlled creameries, cheese factories, and evaporated milk plants located throughout the Northwest, and having a farm membership of nearly 100,000 dairy farmers. These illustrations could be amplified a hundredfold, and exist not only in the dairy field but in every field of agriculture.

Obviously, these large-scale cooperative ventures require that the prices paid by purchasers of our products be determined (1) by the economic differences between various markets, particularly with reference to the purchasing power of the varied communities, and (2) the competition which we are required to meet in each of the markets in which we operate.

It is not at all clear under the provisions of this proposed legislation as to whether the fundamental necessity of charging different prices in different markets is to be recognized as legal. Assuming that such different prices are recognized under the bill as economically and legally sound, we are still confronted with the absolute prohibition against meeting competition contained in the bill.

The present antitrust statute provides that price discriminations made in good faith to meet competition shall not be considered a violation of the law. This provision is eliminated by the Robinson-Patman bill. Thus in every city where competitors cut prices and are not subject to this bill because either (1) they operate only in one market and give the same price to all of their customers or (2) they operate in intrastate commerce and thus are not subject to the bill, our cooperatives will be forced to drop out of the market or, if they meet the competition, they must lower their prices in every other market in which they operate. Should they meet this local competition and not reduce their price to the same level in every other market, they will be liable under this bill for triple damages to each of their customers in every other market in the United States.

Thus, under the provisions of this bill, the life of every legitimate farmers' cooperative association in this country is imperiled. Under the pressure of local and uncontrolled competition which we cannot legally meet, our cooperatives will be killed off slowly by either having to retire from every market where unfair competition exists, by being forced to lower prices throughout the United States to the level required to meet such competition, or by meeting such competition in violation of the statute and being killed by damage suits under the triple-damage clause.

We therefore urge upon you in behalf of the organized dairy farmers of this country to restore the language of the original Clayton Act, which makes it permissible to meet competition in good faith.

Although this is the most serious effect of this bill on dairy farmers, we would like to point out one other section of the bill which we feel will be extremely dangerous to some of our cooperatives. This provision is contained in section (c) of the proposed bill, which requires that where advertising allowances are granted to one customer they be granted on equally proportionate terms to all customers. We believe that these restrictions should be confined to giving equal treatment to all customers within the same city, town, or village.

For example, it might be quite possible that one of our cooperatives desires to put on a heavy advertising campaign in one particular city on a cooperative basis with its customers in that market. Certainly, if it desires to do so, it should not be required to put on a similar advertising campaign in all of the other cities, towns, or villages in which it operates. The advertising campaign put on in one particular city may be for the purpose of opening up new territory and may not be necessary in other markets in which the cooperative operates. Under these circumstances, the benefits of sales promotional work in new markets under which our cooperatives and their customers share the expenses would be entirely eliminated by the requirement that similar work be done in markets already long established.

These amendments which we are asking will not in any way interfere with the central objects of the legislation. On the other hand, they are essential to the continuance of our producer-owned and producer-controlled cooperative marketing associations.

If it be impossible to obtain these changes in the bill, we request, on behalf of the organized dairy farmers of this country represented by our federation, that milk and its products be specifically exempted from the provisions of this legislation.

Respectfully submitted.

THE NATIONAL COOPERATIVE MILK PRODUCERS FEDERATION,
By CHAS. W. HOLMAN, Secretary.

Mr. AUSTIN. My attention has been called by Mr. Donald Kane, of the National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation, to the situation in New England, as follows:

In your particular area the New England Dairies, a cooperative of more than 20,000 dairy farmers, sells milk in from 30 to 40 markets. In each of these markets local conditions must be considered in fixing the price at which the milk is sold to the dealers. It would be utterly impossible to charge the same price to all buyers in the different markets. In addition we must be permitted to meet local competition which is wholly intrastate and this is free from any control whatsoever.

Mr. President, I believe I shall conclude my remarks by referring to some of the effects testified to not only by those whose testimony I have read but by many others of the 27 to whom I have referred. These witnesses, in opposing the Robinson-Patman bill, stated that the following would be its effect:

It is an anticonsumer bill, in that it would increase the cost of the necessities of life, and thus reduce the standard of living.

It would injure the farmer by reducing the price of what he sells and increasing the cost of what he buys.

It would reduce consumption, and thus produce unemployment of labor.

It would subsidize the expensive and inefficient multiple middleman system of distribution.

It would lessen competition and foster monopoly.

It is a price-fixing measure.

It would directly reverse the recent trend toward lower distribution cost by preventing the telescoping of wholesale and retail functions under one overhead.

A vote for this bill is a vote for special privilege at the expense of the American consuming public.

It would result in bureaucratic control over industry.

It would emphasize "peaks and valleys" of production, with the attendant evil of seasonal unemployment.

For these and other reasons I am opposed to the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12395) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES OF FOREIGN SERVICE

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 267) for the relief of certain officers and employees of the Foreign Service of the United States who, while in the course of their respective duties, suffered losses of personal property by reason of catastrophes of Nature.

NEW DEAL PROSPERITY

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, when I made some remarks in the Senate April 20, in which I referred to the Democratic controlled Liberty League and called attention to its announced policies and how closely that declaration compared with the Democratic platform of 1932, I had no thought of taking up so much time of the Senate or of stirring up the New Deal Senators to a defense of the New Deal itself.

It may appear to some that I was wasting the time of the "greatest deliberative body in the world", and that the matter which I discussed was not important enough to take up the time of the Senate; but may I, in justification, call attention to the fact that the Senate has not been engaged during the past 4 months in anything very constructive. The one thing that we have done which the country will remember is the passing of the bonus bill over the President's veto. The other important things which this Congress is compelled to consider are the recommendation of the President for another $1,500,000,000 for relief and a tax bill which is calculated to tax the people more than another three-quarters of a billion dollars.

These measures have not yet reached us, and the chances are it will be very many days, if not weeks, before the Senate even begins to consider them. Since, therefore, there is nothing very important to do, and since Mr. Farley and the New Deal Senators are boasting so much about the New Deal prosperity, it occurs to me that I would be justified in submitting some comments upon that subject at this particular time.

After I had finished my remarks the other day, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] said he was amused. He suggested that I had had a brainstorm, and intimated that I was speaking without knowing what I was saying, and said that every time I spoke "the New Deal becomes more popular."

The junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] also advised me that the people of the country are never going back to the days of what he calls "reactionary administrations for some 12 years." He continued:

> They are never going back to the days when the kind of policies in which the Senator from Delaware believes are to control. It cannot be done. So give it up.

It may be that the people are never going back to the policies in which I believe; but if that be a fact, it will be because this administration is taking the country so far and so rapidly over a dangerous course that it will be impossible for it to get back.

I shall not, however, follow the advice given by the Senator from New York and "give it up."

In England the minority is called "His Majesty's loyal opposition." In order to properly describe it in this country, we have to leave out the word "loyal." I shall continue for a time, at least, to be a part of "His Majesty's opposition", in an effort to show the inconsistencies that abound in the New Deal, the emptiness of the claims made for it, and the dangers that confront us if we do not check it soon.

February 22 of this year the Honorable James A. Farley, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, made a speech before the Washington Day banquet of the Kansas Democratic Club at Topeka, Kans. This speech was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 25 of this year, and something like 125,000 copies of it were sent through Mr. Farley's Post Office Department without any cost whatever to the Democratic National Committee, or to anybody except the Post Office Department and the taxpayer.

I shall refer to portions of that speech and undertake to answer it.

Here is his description of the situation at the beginning of the Roosevelt administration. He said:

> Month by month the army of the unemployed lengthened until the jobless and their dependents numbered more than 30,000,000 men, women, and children. The press was reporting the suicides of fathers and mothers who were unable to endure the suffering of their own children.

Speaking of the farmers, he said:

> They swarmed into the highways, grim-faced and determined, armed with pitchforks, and they actually dragged judges from the bench. They resorted to violence because they had no other remedy to protect their homes and their children.

> The courts of bankruptcy were busy with the ruin of merchants and retailers. * * * Banks were failing with increasing momentum until the total became staggering. * * * Hundreds of thousands of home owners, out of work, out of savings, deprived of an income, were losing their little homes. * * * The railroads were on the verge of collapse. * * * Ugly mobs gathered in the large cities to protest the dispossession of families in the dead of winter when they lacked food, fuel, and a place to go. Local government units faced exhausted credits and revenues, and pleaded to the Federal Government for help. They pleaded in vain. The streets were thronged with poor, hungry fellows begging the price of a sandwich or a bit of food. * * * What was done in 1930 and 1931 and 1932 to correct the horrible conditions I have just described? You can answer that yourself. Nothing was done.

Before endeavoring to produce the evidence to refute the false statement by Mr. Farley that "nothing was done", I desire to refer to the remedy proposed by the Democratic Party in its platform adopted at the end of June 1932, when, it must be presumed, the members of the convention knew what the situation had been in 1930, 1931, and the first part of the year 1932. Let us see what that great party offered to the country when it nominated as its candidate for President Franklin D. Roosevelt, a candidate who subscribed to the platform 100 percent. Let us see if there is in the platform anything which indicated the method the Democrats proposed to follow to correct such alleged conditions.

The Democratic platform of 1932, after describing what it called the unprecedented economic and social distress that existed, declared:

> The only hope for improving present conditions, restoring employment, affording permanent relief to the people, and bringing the Nation back to the proud position of domestic happiness and of financial, industrial, agricultural, and commercial leadership in the world lies in a drastic change in economic governmental policies.

And then follows the provision in the platform stating that the platform is a covenant with the people to be faithfully kept by the party when entrusted with power, and that the people are entitled to know in plain words the terms of the contract to which they are asked to subscribe; and here, Mr. President, follows Mr. Farley's program to relieve the conditions which he described in his Topeka speech.

The first is the reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance, to accomplish a saving of not less than 25 percent in the cost of the Federal Government. The second is the maintenance of the national credit by a Federal Budget annually balanced on the basis of accurate Executive estimates within revenues, raised by a system of taxation levied on the principle of ability to pay. The third is the advocacy of a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards, and as international monetary conference to consider the rehabilitation of silver and related questions. Here is the provision with respect to relief, and I quote the exact words:

We advocate the extension of Federal credit to the States to provide unemployment relief wherever the diminishing resources of the States make it impossible for them to provide for the needy; expansion of the Federal program of necessary and useful construction affected with a public interest such as adequate flood control and waterways.

The fifth provision advocates—

The spread of employment by a substantial reduction in the hours of labor, the encouragement of the shorter week by applying that principle in Government service.

And then follows this provision:

The enactment of every constitutional measure that will aid the farmers to receive for their basic farm commodities prices in excess of cost.

And then this:

We advocate a Navy and an Army adequate for national defense, based on a survey of all facts affecting the existing establishments, that the people in time of peace may not be burdened by an expenditure fast approaching a billion annually.

Just here let me call attention to the fact that the Democratic Party in its platform was complaining about the people in time of peace being burdened by an expenditure for national defense with a sum fast approaching a billion dollars annually. It was referring to an appropriation, in a Republican administration, of an amount a little more than $817,000,000. During the 3 years of the Roosevelt administration we find this sum increased for the fiscal year 1937 to an amount of $1,160,000,000.

Referring again to the platform, we find the following provisions:

* * * Strengthening and impartial enforcement of the antitrust laws to prevent monopoly and unfair trade practices; * * * the removal of Government from all fields of private enterprise except where necessary to develop public works and natural resources in the common interest; * * * regulation * * * of holding companies; * * * quicker methods of realizing on assets for the relief of depositors of suspended banks; and a more rigid supervision of national banks. * * *

Extravagance of the Farm Board was condemned, and particularly its disastrous action which made the Government a speculator of farm products, while the unsound policy of restricting agricultural products to the demands of domestic markets was attacked. The Hawley-Smoot tariff bill—which, the platform said, had destroyed international trade, driven our factories into foreign countries, robbed our farmers of their foreign markets, and increased the cost of production—was condemned.

Then, let me read the last paragraph:

In conclusion, to accomplish these purposes and to recover economic liberty, we pledge the nominees of this convention the best efforts of a great party, whose founder announced the doctrine which guides us now in the hour of our country's need: "Equal rights to all; special privileges to none."

It will be observed that in this provision of the platform reference is made to the founder of the Democratic Party. It was Thomas Jefferson, and the principles which he advocated, to which the Democratic Party was pledging itself; and it will be observed that in the very last line of the platform the party quoted Thomas Jefferson:

Equal rights to all; special privileges to none.

Immediately after the nomination at that convention Mr. Farley was made chairman of the Democratic National Committee; and he urged the election of candidates pledged to this particular platform. He now brags about what has been accomplished. He boasts of the courage of his Chief. Before the election, however, he was insisting that—

The only hope for improving present conditions, restoring employment, affording permanent relief to the people, and bringing the Nation back to the proud position of domestic happiness and of financial, industrial, agricultural, and commercial leadership in the world lies in a drastic change in economic governmental policies.

The first of these changes which Mr. Farley and his party proposed was a reduction of Government expenses by 25 percent, by the elimination of bureaus, and so forth. The second was the balancing of the Federal Budget annually. The third was a sound currency, and so forth. The only provision made for relief was the extension of Federal credit to the States, the spread of employment by a substantial reduction of hours of those engaged in Government service, and the construction of public works, such as adequate flood control and waterways.

As we look at the picture now, the alleged wisdom that has brought us to the fine position which Mr. Farley described in that speech is not to be found in the Democratic convention of 1932, but is based upon Roosevelt's violations of every Democratic principle announced in that platform, and the adoption of a plan which was never discussed during the campaign. It will not do to say that this change on the part of the President was due to a change in the conditions of the country, because Mr. Farley points out that these horrible conditions existed long before the election. He calls attention to the condition of the farmers in the summer of 1932, when they were swarming into the highways and dragging judges from the bench, and he states that these conditions existed during the years 1930 and 1931.

Notwithstanding the solemn promises that the platform constitutes a covenant with the people to be faithfully kept by the party when entrusted with power, Mr. Farley, as early as June 28, 1934, repudiated the platform for himself and for the President; for on that date, before the Rotary Club in Detroit, he had this to say:

Let me tell you that there was nothing sporadic about this program. It was worked out in Mr. Roosevelt's mind before he was even nominated for the Presidency. He has known all the time just what he was driving at. There is nothing impulsive about him, except the impulse to serve his country.

In all of the political history of this great country there has been nothing that compares with this violation of the trust imposed in a great political party.

If the Democratic Party had in mind relieving these conditions by spending $15,000,000,000 of the people's money, was it quite fair to the American people to promise a reduction in Government expenses by 25 percent? Was it quite fair to promise the American people that the Budget would be balanced and the deficits eliminated?

Bringing relief to the unemployed of a nation and improving the business conditions of a nation by the expenditure of something like $15,000,000,000 does not of itself show greatness in an executive. Just an ordinary person could spend this much of the people's money and bring temporary relief to those who had received it. I admit that it takes more than an ordinary man to get an American Congress to agree to adopt any such extravagant course, and I admit also that it takes a certain kind of courage to do any such thing; but it is not the kind of courage that is to be admired. It is pure recklessness, and a disregard of the penalty that ultimately must be paid by this and future generations, after Mr. Roosevelt shall have retired to private life.

Mr. Farley may be able to sell this idea to two classes of persons—those who are on the Federal pay rolls, or who are directly or indirectly receiving Federal money for doing little or nothing, and the class of persons who do not think, and who are swayed by the doctrine that whatever may be said about Mr. Roosevelt, they are convinced that he means well. Mr. Farley will not, however, be able to sell this idea to a majority of the honest voters of the Nation.

Let me return to the charge made by Mr. Farley that in 1930, 1931, and 1932 nothing was done to prevent the horrible conditions which he says existed.

It is estimated that the normal expenditure upon direct family relief and homeless men by city, State, and county authorities, together with private agencies, amounts approximately to $25,000,000 annually during normal times. In 1931, however, under the direction of the President's Unemployment Relief Organization, an organization composed of leading men and women from all parts of the country, $300,000,000 was raised and expended for relief. This did not include the vast amount of personal relief extended through the voluntary efforts of various organizations at the President's suggestion. In addition to that, the public-works program had been increased until the Federal Government was expending, during that fiscal year, about $500,000,000 more than normal. In the latter part of that year Mr. Gifford, who was the head of the relief organization to which I have referred, reported that the appeal for private relief for the unemployed had been 50 percent greater than in the previous year.

President Hoover sent a message to Congress in December 1931, out of which finally grew the organization of the R. F. C. In that message he proposed that the R. F. C. be authorized to loan to States, for the direct relief of the distressed, $300,000,000. Compare this recommendation with that of the declaration of the Democratic platform of 1932, in which it is said:

> We advocate the extension of Federal credit to the States to provide unemployment relief wherever the diminishing resources of the States make it impossible for them to provide for the needy.

This declaration of the Democratic platform was following in the exact footsteps proposed by Mr. Hoover in that message to Congress in December 1931.

On December 11, 1931, in a public statement, the President said, "Almost every locality in the country has reported that it will take care of its own. In order to assure that there will be no failure to meet problems as they arise, the organization will continue through the winter", referring to the President's Unemployment Relief Organization.

On October 1, 1931, the President announced the result of the relief survey, and at that time all of the States, except one, reported that with the aid of the Federal and local public works then in progress, added to the resources of State, local, and private agencies, they would be able to carry the burden of direct relief during the next year. The one exception was not the State of New York of which Mr. Roosevelt was Governor; it was the State of Pennsylvania.

The R. F. C. was authorized to lend $300,000,000 to the States for relief, and it began making these loans in July 1932; and during the 8-month period ended February 1933 it had loaned to the States more than $210,000,000. The Government furnished to the Red Cross 85,000,000 bushels of wheat and 175,000,000 pounds of cotton for relief of the distressed.

The records show that the health conditions of the people generally were improved during those 3 years. At the end of 1932, for instance, the health condition of all classes of people, including children, was better than in 1929.

Notwithstanding these facts, Mr. Farley says the previous administration did nothing, and he would have the country believe that the people of the country were starving at the time Roosevelt was inaugurated.

Now, let us see if it be true that "nothing was done" in other directions. We are told by Mr. Farley that banks were failing with increasing momentum; that hundreds of thousands of home owners were losing their homes; that the railroads were on the verge of collapse; and so forth. But the record shows that the R. F. C. had been created and was in operation as early as February 2, 1932, with resources of $3,500,000,000, and that it was created for the purpose of supporting banks, insurance companies, building and loan associations, and railways; to make large loans for productive works and for employment relief; to establish agricultural-credit banks; to make loans to States which were unable to care for the people in distress.

The record shows that prior to March 1933 the R. F. C. had assisted in one way or another these various institutions to the extent of $2,021,774,898.29.

Let us get a view of the details of this distribution. The banks and trust companies were loaned more than $1,035,000,0000. In addition, the R. F. C. had subscribed and paid for preferred stocks in banks and trust companies to the amount of $12,500,000; building and loan associations were assisted to the extent of more than $103,000,000; mortgage-loan companies by a little less than $129,000,000; insurance companies by a little less than $79,000,000; railroads by $331,000,000; more than $201,000,000 had been advanced for relief and work relief; and more than $108,000,000 was advanced to relieve the distressed farmers whose creditors were embarrassing them. Approximately $1,600,000,000 of this fund was outstanding at the time Mr. Roosevelt was inaugurated, and constituted a part of the deficit of which Mr. Roosevelt so bitterly complained during the whole campaign of 1932.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. I have been trying to follow the Senator from Delaware. Is he now justifying the expenditure of Federal funds to bring relief and to help recovery?

Mr. HASTINGS. I am answering Mr. Farley's statement that nothing was done.

Mr. MINTON. Done for what?

Mr. HASTINGS. For anybody. Mr. Farley said nothing was done. I am answering that false statement.

Mr. MINTON. The Senator now says that something was done?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes. Does the Senator follow me, and has he heard what I have told him was done?

Mr. MINTON. I have been trying to follow the Senator, but heretofore I have always understood the Senator to speak against that sort of thing.

Mr. HASTINGS. Never mind. I am answering now one point. Farley said nothing was done, and I am answering that false statement.

This is by no means the whole story, but it shows that through various agencies the Federal Government, directly and indirectly, was responsible for an expenditure approaching $3,000,000,000 in the year 1932; and it is worth noting also that a Republican President finally persuaded a Democratic Congress to enact legislation which reduced the normal expenses of the Government by more than $300,000,000, and to adopt a revenue measure which increased the annual revenue by a billion dollars.

It was upon this record of the Hoover administration that Mr. Roosevelt went to the country, demanding that deficits be eliminated and that the Budget be balanced. Compare that record with the record of the present administration. Remembering the facts which I have outlined, I wonder what conclusion the people of the Nation can possibly reach when a member of the President's Cabinet tries to make them believe that nothing was done by the Hoover administration to relieve the distressed condition in the country.

The people know also that when Mr. Roosevelt came into office, after having condemned practically everything done by the Republican administration, he continued the operations of the R. F. C., and I think it is not too much to say that that organization, since this administration went into effect, is the outstanding, if not the only thing that has been done in a constructive way to take this country out of the depression. During the first 3 years of this administration the R. F. C. continued loans on an average of about $2,000,000,000 annually, which is about the same amount expended by this Corporation during the Hoover administration. In other words, the loans were increased from $2,000,000,000 to $8,000,000,000.

Just here, while I am complaining about the false statements made by Mr. Farley, it might be well to refer to a statement made by the President in his Baltimore speech on April 13, a statement that is so far from the truth that it must be shocking to those who know the real facts. I refer to this paragraph in that speech:

> Some counselors say "confidence and normal prosperity will cure everything—give everybody jobs." They generally mean by that the confidence and prosperity of 1928. But, my friends, 1928 was no millennium. You and I know the simple fact that while production was increasing and profits were increasing in 1928 and 1929 unemployment was growing at an astounding rate. Return to the 1928 kind of prosperity is no sufficient answer. The best that the captains of the country could do for you before the depression was not good enough then, and it is not good enough today.

Let us see what the facts are, and see whether there is any justification in the statement made by the President that in 1928 and 1929, "unemployment was growing at an astounding rate." Before giving the figures, let me call attention to the President's own estimate, in his speech before the Congress in January 1935, that there were 1,500,000 people who were unemployable. If we eliminate this 1,500,000 we find that the average of the unemployed for the year 1927 was 555,000. If we eliminate the unemployables for the year 1928, the year in which Mr. Roosevelt says the number of unemployed was "growing at an astounding rate", we find that the average for the year of unemployed was 700,000, and for the year 1929 was 364,000, after we eliminate the unemployables. It was not until the depression came upon us that the number of unemployed began to grow at an astounding rate.

The people of the Nation are accustomed to the incorrect statements made by the Postmaster General, but they can hardly excuse any such gross misstatements as this coming from the President of the United States.

On Saturday, April 25, in a political address made by the President in New York, he made another remarkable statement:

> But some individuals are never satisfied. People complain to me about the current costs of rebuilding America, about the burden on future generations. I tell them that, whereas the deficit of the Federal Government this year is about $3,000,000,000, the national income of the people of the United States has risen from $35,000,000,000 in the year 1932 to $65,000,000,000 in the year 1936, and I tell them further that the only burden we need to fear is the burden our children would have to bear if we failed to take these measures today.

In the first place, the national income for 1932 was $39,500,000,000, and there is no means of estimating with any degree of certainty what it will be in 1936. In fact, there are no official figures for 1935, but the most optimistic estimate for 1935, a New Deal prosperous year, is $54,500,000,000, and these figures are in terms of a 60-cent dollar, which of itself would bring it to something like $7,000,000,000 below the national income for 1932. The increase in commodity prices has been more than 22 percent over 1932, and that immediately reduces the purchasing power of this national income for 1935 by about $12,000,000,000. So, if we disregard the decrease in the value of the dollar, and confine ourselves to the increase in commodity prices, we find that the purchasing power of the national income is reduced to $42,500,000,000 for 1935, or an increase of only $3,000,000,000 over the year 1932.

But let us take another view of it. The President, in his speech, indicates that nobody has a right to complain of a deficit of $3,000,000,000 when the national income has increased, from 1932 to 1936, by $30,000,000,000. The thought he intends to leave with the country is that it has been benefited to the extent of $27,000,000,000. I have already shown the inaccuracy of his own figures.

In his Baltimore speech he said:

> The year 1928 was no millennium.

And that to—

> Return to the 1928 kind of prosperity is no sufficient answer. The best the captains of the country could do for you before the depression was not good enough then and is not good enough today.

In the year 1928 the national income was approximately $80,000,000,000, or about $640 for every man, woman, and child in America. The cost of the Federal Government for the fiscal year 1928 was $3,100,000,000, or a little over $24 per capita. In the year 1935 the national income was approximately $54,500,000,000, or $436 per capita; the cost of Government, it is estimated, will be about $7,500,000,000, or a cost per capita of $60. So that in 1928, if each person had paid his proportionate share of the taxes, he would have had $606 left. In 1935, however, after he paid his proportionate share of taxes, he had only $376 left.

It may be that 1928 was no millennium, and it may be that the captains could not do enough; but it was, to say the least, a great improvement over the present situation.

On February 22 Mr. Farley, in his speech in Kansas, painted a beautiful picture of the New Deal prosperity. This was followed on March 12 in a radio address by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]; and then, on April 20, in the Senate, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] gave a list remarkable in many respects.

Among the improved conditions is that mentioned by the Senator from Arkansas. In his radio speech of March 12 he called attention to the fact that railway-freight revenues had increased by more than $155,000,000 in the year 1935 over 1934, and that passenger revenues had increased approximately $12,000,000. He failed, however, to call attention to the fact that the combined steam railways of the country were still "in the red" at the end of 1935, as compared with a profit in the 11 years—1921 to 1931—running all the way from $134,000,000 to $896,000,000.

The Senator from New York tells us that security values on the New York Stock Exchange have increased by $31,000,000,000 during the Roosevelt administration; department-store sales increased by $4,500,000,000 per year; and the annual national income has increased by over $12,000,000,000. On the same day, April 20, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] called attention to the fact that the General Motors Corporation—owned very largely, he says, by the Du Ponts, Mr. Raskob, and Mr. Sloan—shows an enormous increase in sales and profits. In March of this year General Motors, he tells us, sold more automobiles and made larger profits than in any previous month of its history except May 1928.

Then, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] joined in and quoted from the newspapers that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad's net revenue reached more than $24,000,000. He also called attention to the increase in steel companies' profits, and how stocks have improved in value, and how the Du Pont profits have increased.

Mr. President, this is the evidence offered of New Deal prosperity from the point of view of the New Deal Senators whose names I have mentioned. They say the New Deal prosperity is the one thing that makes the Republican cause this year hopeless.

The distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], after offering this evidence of prosperity, said:

> The American people are going to keep in office the great man who is now President, this man of vision, who concerns himself with the underprivileged and the unfortunate, who concerns himself with lifting them up to a better and a more abundant economic life. It is a fortunate thing for the country that we have such a leader in this day of trial and crisis.

Mr. President, in 1928, when the Republicans called attention to the prosperous conditions of the railroads, motor industries, department stores, steel industries, and the rise in the stock market, they were met with the charge that these were special interests which had received favors at the hands of the Republican administration and that such prosperity was at the expense of the underprivileged and the unfortunate. At that time, when this charge was made against us, the yearly average of the unemployed was less than 2,000,000 persons.

These witnesses for New Deal prosperity fail to call attention to the fact that Treasury reports show that the incorporated business of the Nation has paid out more than $26,000,000,000 from its surplus funds in its fight against the depression. They also fail to call attention to the fact that the President has recommended that these surpluses be destroyed by taxation upon the assumption, I assume, that if his policies are followed the country will never see another depression. They also fail to call attention to evidence submitted to the Congress on May 9, 1934, in the form of 183 newspaper clippings running from August 16, 1932, to November 8, 1932, showing conclusively that business recovery was definitely under way before the election of 1932.

The New Deal Senators, who insist that the country is going to keep in as President the man who concerns himself with lifting the underprivileged and the unfortunate up to a better and more abundant life, give as a reason for doing so the fact that these wealthy corporations are now prosperous and that the gamblers on the stock exchange are making huge sums of money.

The President, in his Baltimore speech, referred to the "captains" of the country. When the New Dealers refer to the prosperity of the railroads, General Motors, the Du Pont Co., and the steel industries, they, too, must have in mind the same captains of the country referred to by the President. These are the same people referred to some time ago by the President as constituting the "entrenched greed" and the "industrial autocrats" who had controlled the country for more than 10 years before his inauguration. Can it be said that the President has again changed his mind and that the New Deal Senators speak for him when they boast of the profits that are being made by these corporations and by the "money changers" whom the President promised to "drive out of the temple"? They have been boasting, and they continue to boast, that the object of this administration is to care for the underprivileged, the forgotten man, and so forth; but they offer as evidence of their success the prosperity of the industrial autocrats. This is a strange combination of argument to make to the American people.

I inquire whether it is any particular satisfaction to the 12,550,000 unemployed to find that stocks have increased on the New York Stock Exchange by $31,000,000,000. Is there any hope of the unemployed finding a job because of this increase in the value of stocks? Some New Dealer has declared that the unemployed cannot eat the Constitution, and with that, of course, we all agree; but may I inquire of him whether or not he thinks they can eat the paper profits that now exist on the New York Stock Exchange?

There is another strange thing about the New Deal prosperity which needs some explanation, if the New Deal Senators are correct in their description of it. If the prosperity of the business concerns of the Nation is to be the one thing that assures success to the New Deal administration in the election in 1936, how can the fact be accounted for that practically all of business in this country, both large and small, is against the reelection of Mr. Roosevelt?

I should also like to inquire whether it can be truthfully said that there is prosperity in a country like ours when 12,550,000 persons are walking the streets, unable to find jobs, and dependent upon so-called jobs, or outright dole, furnished by a Federal Government? Add to this the difficulty of getting jobs and the difficulty of getting any form of relief, without being subjected to the miserable and scandalous exactions of the local Democrats, who are in charge of furnishing the relief, and we have the picture of a republic that has started on a downward course.

Remember that the total of persons eligible for gainful employment is approximately 52,000,000, and more than 12,000,000 of these are out of jobs. This means that they are being helped by the 40,000,000 who have jobs. The persons gainfully employed have to add the cost of approximately one person to each family in order to pay their proportionate share of the cost of supporting those who have no jobs.

Can there be said to be real prosperity when such conditions exist? Can it be said that the President has been successful in his concern for the underprivileged and the unfortunate? Can it be said that he has lifted them up to a better and a more abundant economic life?

The answer is that this administration has created practically nothing that was constructive. Its policy, the one the New Deal Senators brag about, is that of taking from the earnings of one and giving to another. There may be some justification in doing this, because we all recognize our responsibility in taking care of those in distress; but I beg of you who are so proud of the record that has been made not to boast of this New Deal prosperity until it reaches a place that is a little easier to defend, and a little more in line with what we have reason to expect from a great Republic like this. Do not boast of what you tried to do under the N. R. A. and the A. A. A. Can it be said that an administration has reason to be proud of forcing through the Congress legislation which was in violation of the Constitution of the United States? Will this administration have the courage, or the audacity, to give as an excuse, either now or in the coming election, that its effort to find jobs for the unemployed failed because the Supreme Court declared its pet measure unconstitutional?

I called the attention of the Senator from New York to the fact that there are about 12,500,000 persons out of jobs. In reply to that he said:

> Let me say to the Senator from Delaware that there are not quite that many. There are about 11,000,000; and as conditions improve we are going to reabsorb them.

That is another promise from the New Deal just before election.

I have quoted to Senators, from the 1932 platform, what the Democrats said they were going to do in the way of restoring employment. At the end of October 1932, a few days before the election of Mr. Roosevelt as President, there were 13,415,000 persons unemployed. At the end of February 1936, just 3 years after Mr. Roosevelt had taken office, the number of unemployed had decreased to but 12,550,000. So in all those 3 years of New Deal "prosperity", with the expenditure of billions of dollars of the public money, this administration succeeded in reducing the unemployed by the number of 865,000.

The Republican administration, in the 2 months of September and October 1932, just before the Roosevelt administration, reduced the unemployed by 552,522; so that they actually did in a period of about 2 months, before the country found that a new Executive was to take charge of the Government, pretty nearly as well as Roosevelt has done during the whole 3 years of his administration and after adopting all kinds of methods including manipulation of the Constitution of the United States.

Remember this: To give 12,500,000 unemployed the small sum of $1,000 annually per family—and certainly no New Dealer would admit that anything less than that would be adequate—would take $12,500,000,000 each year. In addition to that, this administration has increased the cost of living by 18.2 percent. This increased cost of living and this huge sum annually for the unemployed must be borne, directly or indirectly, by the 40,000,000 people in the United States who are gainfully employed. The burden is upon them, either through contributions to charity, municipal or State taxation, or Federal taxation, and Mr. Roosevelt has well said that "the taxes must be paid by the sweat of the brow of the laboring man."

In view of these facts, I beg of the New Deal Senators not to brag about the prosperity of the country. Do not boast of the ease with which the New Dealers expect to get the voters of the Nation to give it their approval because of present prosperity. It will be necessary for you to adopt some argument more effective than your alleged New Deal prosperity to secure their votes.

Let us measure this prosperity by the number of unemployed, as reported by the American Federation of Labor.

The average number of unemployed in 1929 was 1,864,000. That is pretty close to the number estimated by the President in his annual message to Congress in January 1935 as persons that were unemployable.

But let us pass on to the figures of the unemployed during the depression. Let us take the years 1930, 1931, and 1932, when Mr. Farley says that the Republican administration was doing nothing to relieve the distressed conditions. The average of the unemployed for those 3 years was 8,893,000, a shocking number, to be sure, even in the time of a depression. Let us pass also to the years of 1933, 1934, and 1935. Mr. Roosevelt was President during this time, with the exception of the first 2 months of 1933. The average of the unemployed for those 3 years is 12,762,000, or an increase of 3,869,000. It may be well to note also that this average for the 3 years is not very different from the 12,550,000 unemployed in February 1936, a few months after the so-called New Deal prosperity was in full swing.

Much has been said in reply to the suggestion in Republican quarters that in the fall of 1932 before the election conditions were improved. Let us see whether this is as false as has been charged by the Democrats.

In 1931 the increase of the unemployed between August and October was 723,725, while in 1932, between the same dates, the trend was reversed and the unemployed had decreased by 552,522, showing an improvement in 1932 over 1931 of 1,276,247 in the number of unemployed.

These figures may not be particularly interesting, but there is not much to be said in favor of the prosperity of an administration which finds at the end of 3 years a total of 12,550,000 out of employment.

This administration is not as optimistic about the approaching election as it pretends to be. It has too many things to explain to the intelligent voters of the Nation. Even the average New Dealer knows that.

You cannot evade the justness in the charge that you have violated practically all of the important planks of the Democratic platform of 1932. You cannot expect longer to fool the people into believing that you have kept those solemn pledges. You cannot explain away the extravagance and waste that has been going on for the past 3 years and still continues. You cannot explain to the American people the unfairness of using your relief program to strengthen your political position.

The emptiness of your prosperity claims is recognized. You will get little satisfaction in quoting the increased profits from the annual reports of some business firms when it is remembered that most of these profits are being taken away by the Federal Government to meet the expenses of your extravagances, and when it is known that the little fellow in the business world, whom you have prosecuted along with the big businessman, has not as yet recovered from your blow.

You will not be able to convince the twelve and one-half million unemployed that there is much hope for them in increased profits for corporations unless you can find a way for them to get back their old jobs. And when you review your own record in this respect for the past 3 years you must, indeed, have little confidence in your ability to convince the unemployed that you may yet find a real way to help them. You never will be able to show that prosperity and unemployment walk hand in hand. It never has in all history. It never will, and you New Dealers ought to know it.

You will not be able to violate all the principles of civil-service reform and build up the greatest political machine in all history and expect to escape the wrath of the people. You cannot expect the American people to approve your policy that the Executive must be all-powerful and that the legislative and judicial branches of Government must only be servants to his will. You will not be able to convince the American people that the Justices of the United States Supreme Court were violating their duties in declaring New Deal acts to be unconstitutional.

You may not reasonably expect the American people to sit quietly by while their rights are being violated—those rights which are guaranteed by a Constitution which many New Dealers now scoff at and scorn.

Our people are not going to submit quietly to their personal affairs being inquired into by an army of New Deal snoopers, their property seized without legal process. They will not permit, unchallenged, the partial destruction of the freedom of the press. They will not submit to the reign of terrorism by inquisition.

The American people may not be willing to return to what you call the "old order", but they will not submit to the regimentation of their farmers or their laborers. They will not submit to the regimentation of business or to Government competition with business. They will approve of no plan which tends to destroy the Republic or to any plan which imitates the dictatorships of Europe. The American people are willing to be governed, but they want to be governed only to the extent that is absolutely necessary, and they want the cost of that government to be reasonable. They want to enjoy the fruits of their own labor and they will oppose laboring and paying to a Government that wastes and misuses the money they pay to it.

You cannot violate the States' rights policy laid down by the founder of the Democratic Party, Thomas Jefferson, and not have to account for your action to real Democrats when election day comes.

You have complained from time to time that the Republican Party has no platform. Do not disturb yourselves about the Republican Party's platform or its candidate—you will have both in another month or so.

If you concern yourselves with your own troubles, it will take every available minute of your time from now until election day in your futile efforts to explain the things I have outlined and to answer the American people's criticism of your own miscalled Democratic administration.

Now, Mr. President, before the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] applauds me [laughter], I want to give him a little friendly advice about his new keynote speech by referring to that which he delivered on June 28, 1932, in which he said:

> By the grossest deception and misrepresentation ever perpetrated in American politics, by the most base and sordid appeals to ignorance and prejudice, it took advantage of a people disturbed by the rapid transformation in national and world events, won the election in November, and on the 4th of March 1921 took charge of every branch of the National Government.
> It were a pity we cannot blot from our memory the events of the next few years. But—
> The moving finger writes; and having writ,
> Moves on; nor all your piety nor wit
> Shall lure it back to cancel half a line,
> Nor all your tears wash out a word of it.

And toward the end of that speech he had this to say:

> What will the incoming Democratic administration do about this imperative situation? Do we propose to reduce the expenses of government or merely to hold conversation about it? Do we propose, as our opponents have done, to let not our right hand know what our left hand is doing, and keep our lips ignorant of both?
> Our answer again is emphatically no! We propose to reduce the expenses of this Government not only for its own sake and that of the people, but as an example to smaller units throughout the Nation. We propose to abolish every useless office, every unnecessary bureau and commission which has grown by what it fed on until the total has become an insufferable weight upon all the activities and resources of the American people.
> They will never be abolished by those who now operate them. A new Hercules must clean out these Augean stables.

Let me read this conclusion:

> No, my countrymen, there is nothing wrong with our people except that they have followed prophets who were false, blind, and insensible to their own limitations.
> In all the generations of American history the people in every great crisis have turned to the Democratic Party to lead them from the wilderness of disappointment and disaster.
> It was so in 1800, when the profound and gifted father of American democracy, Thomas Jefferson, led the people from incompetence and reaction to new heights of popular government.
> It was so in 1828, when Andrew Jackson drove out the congregation of the unholy and the unrighteous and restored to the people the government of Jefferson.
> It was so in 1884, when Grover Cleveland returned to the people and to their Government the priceless heritage of a principle that "public office is a public trust."

It was so in 1912, when Woodrow Wilson gave a new interpretation to the inarticulate cravings of the human heart and set the ideals of a world above the sordid machinations of selfishness and brutal greed.

It will be so in 1932, when the principles here announced and the leaders here chosen will in the name of a people betrayed, bewildered, and misled redeem for them a land despoiled and made barren by those who know not the ways of wisdom or of providence.

And the final paragraph:

God of our Fathers, in this hour of the Nation's travail, amid broken hearts, blasted hopes, faces that are drawn, and feet that are eager for the road to labor and to happiness,

"Be with us yet,
Lest we forget,
Lest we forget."

[Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator on concluding his 2 hours' address with a quotation worth while. [Laughter.]

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 247) authorizing the recognition of the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of Harvard College and the beginning of higher education in the United States and providing for the representation of the Government and people of the United States in the observance of the anniversary.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3952) for the relief of Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Lee, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland, Mr. DALY, and Mr. PITTENGER were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4159) for the relief of Anchorage Commercial Co., Inc.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 215) to amend Public Act No. 435, Seventy-second Congress.

PROHIBITION OF PRICE DISCRIMINATIONS

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (S. 3154) making it unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to discriminate in price or terms of sale between purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality, to prohibit the payment of brokerage or commission under certain conditions, to suppress pseudo-advertising allowances, to provide a presumptive measure of damages in certain cases, and to protect the independent merchant, the public whom he serves, and the manufacturer from whom he buys, from exploitation by unfair competitors.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the matter now pending before the Senate. I direct attention to Senate bill 4171, which will be offered as an amendment to the bill now before the Senate. It will be offered either by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] or myself at the appropriate time.

Section 2 of the proposed amendment reads as follows:

SEC. 2. It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to be a party to, or assist in, any transaction of sale, or contract to sell, which discriminates to his knowledge against competitors of the purchaser, in that, any discount, rebate, allowance, or advertising service charge is granted to the purchaser over and above any discount, rebate, allowance, or advertising service charge available at the time of such transaction to said competitors in respect of a sale of goods of like grade, quality, and quantity; to sell, or contract to sell, goods in any part of the United States at prices lower than those exacted by said person elsewhere in the United States for the purpose of destroying competition, or eliminating a competitor in such part of the United States; or, to sell, or contract to sell, goods at unreasonably low prices for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor.

Nothing in this section shall prevent a cooperative association from returning to producers or consumers, or a cooperative wholesale association from returning to its constituent retail members, the whole, or any part of, the net surplus resulting from its trading operations in proportion to purchasers from, or sales to, the association.

Then violations of the terms of the proposed amendment are made punishable by fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year or both.

Mr. President, the amendment is designed to cover certain specific matters which we think ought to be inhibited as a matter of law, certain things which we think ought to be prohibited without the intervention of the discretionary power of the Federal Trade Commission or other bureau. The matters which we propose to prohibit that of allowing discount or rebate or allowance for advertising service charge to one purchaser without making it available to each and every other purchaser. That, it seems to us, should be prohibited as a matter of law, and that there need not be any discretion laid anywhere with reference to the execution of that kind of law. That is the distinction really between the bill which is now pending and the proposed amendment.

It is not our purpose to embarrass or impede the action upon the main measure, but we shall ask that it be adopted as an amendment, believing that the two propositions can be reconciled when the bill goes to conference, and that we can save the principle of both.

Mr. President, I desire to call attention to a statement which has been furnished me by a small independent house in one of the large cities of the United States. It points out more explicitly and more effectively than I could, because the writer has a practical knowledge of defects in the present law and the remedies which are here proposed. The writer says:

If our case were not typical of the situation facing hundreds, possibly thousands, of other manufacturers we would not feel justified in mentioning it. If such cases were not creating a source of danger to farmers and consumers, we would not be justified in presenting our problem.

Our company has built up over a long period of time a business modest in size but sturdy. Our products have real quality and yet have always been most reasonably priced, both to the trade and consumer. As sales grew, prices have been reduced consistently. The consumer has benefited. No unreasonable sums have been spent for advertising. Our average net profit per year has been small. No big salaries have been paid. Gradually the sale of our goods has extended throughout the United States. Our goods, having genuine quality, reasonably priced, have enjoyed a growing popularity with consumers.

Much larger concerns, seeing our business develop, have first tried to sell their competitive products in markets developed by us and sell them at their regular prices. Failing in that, at least some of them have offered inordinately large secret allowances to the one or more concerns dominating those markets. Failing to secure the bulk of the business even in that way, some of those larger concerns finally priced their goods at or below cost in their determination to secure volume for themselves and to dominate those markets on the commodities involved. It has been impossible for us to meet such competition without lowering our quality or actually selling our goods at a heavy loss.

That is a matter which ought to be kept in mind when we are discussing the question of benefiting the consumer. The consumer is not only interested in price but in the quality of the goods. This kind of competition often drives down the quality of the goods which are furnished to the consumer.

Distributors receiving these secret allowances have forced the sale of these lower quality and (to them) higher profit products to the exclusion of our goods.

In numerous markets or centers after we had developed a good volume on our commodities pressure was brought upon us, in one way or another, because of extravagant secret allowances offered by larger competitors. The result has often been that although the market was developed by us and with our goods and allowances, the distributor, offered secret rebates elsewhere, would drop our goods and push either other brands or a private label which all too often represented much lower quality.

Through this unfair competition a number of markets have been practically lost to us, so far as the dominating outlets are concerned.

Unless prohibited by law this condition will force us and many other manufacturers either out of business or into the hands of the large corporations.

The amendment which will be proposed does not undertake to control the question of prices, to fix prices, or to regulate prices. It seeks only to enforce equitable action as to all customers who may be dealing with the party selling the goods. It adopts a rule of law, a rule of justice, which is to be binding upon all parties.

"Loss leader" sales are bait to draw consumers into a store. In spite of the fact that certain outstanding brands are sold with little or no profit by the dominant concern in each market, the consumers' total food bill is no lower. Anyone who knows the food business realizes that either through secret allowances or extra profits on other items sold, the losses on "loss leaders" are made up.

The constant pressure for "rebates" results in lower quality food. It can result in still higher living cost to the consumer.

Force concerns like ours out of business and prices go up, because the unfair "war prices" show even the large concerns a loss. Food costs certainly would rise if, through unfair competition and secret allowances, the now dominant concerns are permitted to become absolute and all-powerful.

Mr. President, one of the reasons why it seems to me the small and independent businessman ought to be permitted to continue in existence is that if the supply comes into the hands of a few great concerns they will no longer have any concern themselves with competition from independent business; they will no longer have to concern themselves with the consumer so long as they do not fix the price so high that the consumer cannot purchase, but to the extent that he is able to purchase the power will rest with them to fix the price at whatever they think fit and proper to dispose of the goods.

Chains and independents can both benefit from large-scale selling by manufacturers. Open competition passes those savings to consumers.

Dr. McNair referred to the savings to the consumer from large-scale selling. Secret allowances have rarely resulted in savings to consumers. There are few instances where secret "brokerage", quantity, promotional, or other unearned allowances have been passed on to the consumer on those products on which they are paid.

Mr. Dunn, in an objection to the Borah bill, referred to the justification for some allowances "made in good faith." There are few food manufacturers who have not had the experience of making secret arrangements in good faith and then not receiving from the distributor just what the distributor agreed to give in return. The manufacturer has not dared to withhold the allowance for fear of reprisals by the distributor. Few manufacturers dare to object to or refuse payment under such circumstances. They know from past history that refusal means that much, if not all, of their sales to such distributors can be wiped out overnight. There are only a few concerns, spending relatively tremendous sums for advertising, which can be confident that they have created such actual demand that their sales will continue once the distributor decides to punish them for withholding unearned allowances.

At a recent hearing Senator LOGAN raised the question of goods sold below cost. Mr. Miller answered that that practice, kept up, led but to bankruptcy. True, if you only consider the average concern which really represents the consuming and taxpaying public. However, such loss selling does not drive into bankruptcy large manufacturers or distributors, who can make up by profits on other items losses sustained on items with which they are conducting their warfare against smaller concerns.

In the process of this ruinous selling, independent grocery stores change hands, many modest-sized manufacturers, chains, and jobbers are so crippled that they gradually shrink in size or are actually forced out of business. All of this leads absolutely to the concentration of domination over foods in the hands of a constantly decreasing number of manufacturers and distributors.

Regardless of their names, secret allowances permit concerns receiving them to sell other products or brands at, below, or near cost. The effect of such unprofitable selling is loss to many capable, honest competitors who are not receiving either any or sufficient secret allowances to enable them to meet all of these low prices and still prosper on their total sales.

The distributors who receive the greatest number of these extra and secret allowances generally represent a minority of the outlets, but through the allowances are enabled to absolutely dominate their markets. That is true whether the secret receiver be wholesaler, retailer, or chain.

The payment of "brokerage" to a buyer is nothing under the sun but a subterfuge for a price concession. I refer, of course, to buying organizations which receive and, all too frequently, demand "brokerage" from competing concerns on the same commodities. It is obvious that a buying agency cannot possibly represent, as a broker, competing concerns making the same grades and types of products. It is claimed that such concessions are passed on to the consumer. In the great majority of cases this is absolutely untrue. Funds collected through such means go to swell the surplus of these concerns. It might almost be called a contribution to the buyers' "war chest."

In that connection, I wish to read a statement furnished me as to where these profits go. Somebody must supply these large amounts, and there is no one to supply them but the consumer.

One chain-store organization pays its president $188,075 in salary and dividend. It pays one vice president $146,000, and another vice president $52,722. The treasurer is paid $50,625. One member of the board of directors is paid $42,950.

It is useless to talk about protecting the consumer if the consumer is to be asked to employ such costly agents. Somebody must provide those large sums; and it is apparent that the "loss leaders" are but enticements into the store, where are sold to the consumer other products at a much increased price. Otherwise, the institution could not run and pay such salaries.

Mr. Sammons, of the Institute of Distribution, is reported to have said at a Senate committee hearing that the chains represented about 8 percent of the grocery business. His reported figure is open to question. But, even if accurate, the fact remains that in the most populous sections of the country one or more chains or other type distributors actually so dominate each market that whatever they do largely determines the success or failure of manufacturers, retailers, and jobbers selling in that market.

From a letter on this subject, addressed to me from Omaha, I quote a single paragraph:

What we all want is to see the army of unemployed back to work. It seems to me that the concentration of big industry is the vital bar standing in the way of this accomplishment.

And how eminently correct this writer is.

For instance, in my own neighborhood there is an independent grocer who employs 28 people. On the next corner to him is a national drug chain employing two people. In the center of the next block is a chain food store that employs two people. In the same block are two other chains. On the corner is an independent druggist employing seven people. To the north six blocks is another chain store employing two people. An independent grocer is one-half block east and employs 32 people. It would seem to me that if all lines of business, not particularly the food lines, but drugs, shoes, hardware, etc., that have become so stagnated through chain organization, could eliminate this factor or even be on an even basis with the chain organizations, this army of unemployed would soon be absorbed by legitimate industry.

In any event, what these people ask is to be put upon an even basis with the large distributors; and that is the design of the amendment in providing that all discounts, rebates, allowances, and so forth, shall be available to all the customers of the distributor.

Mr. President, I do not think the principle of this amendment is in conflict with the principle of the main bill. It does contain, however, specific provisions of law, violation of which would constitute an offense; and the person violating them may be taken into court instead of being taken before the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOORE in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. LOGAN. There is only one thing about the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Indiana that it seems to me might be open to some objection. Mind you, I am for the amendment. I think it is all right except in this one particular, upon which I should like to have the views of the Senator from Idaho.

There is no limitation on quantity discounts. The larger the purchasing power the greater the quantities purchased, until eventually the quantities may be so great that there will be practically no competition in that particular field. When that condition arises a few purchasers may purchase in such large quantities that others are shut out; therefore the others cannot get the benefit of that discount.

Under the Robinson bill the Federal Trade Commission is authorized to fix a quantity limit above which there shall be no quantity discount. I ask the Senator if he apprehends any danger from allowing unlimited quantity discounts, regardless of the quantity which may be purchased?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has put his finger upon the point which has been most troublesome to my coauthor and myself. That is the question of controlling the quantity; and I doubt if it can be controlled except in some fashion such as indicated in the Robinson bill. However, after consulting a number of the independent merchants, I found that they felt they would be reasonably safe in view of the fact that they could combine for the purpose of purchasing and in a general way protect themselves on the question of quantity.

Mr. LOGAN. I agree with the Senator that that is true up to a certain point; but if those of large purchasing power keep on increasing their purchasing power they will eventually reach a point where, even by combination, the independents cannot compete with perhaps a combination of those having tremendous purchasing power.

As the Senator suggested, Mr. Sammons stated that only 8 percent of distribution was through the chains. Just this morning, however, I examined a report sent to me covering my own State—and I suppose it covers other States as well—and I find that 22 percent of the distribution now is made through the chain stores, as against about 78 percent through the independents and others. The proportion of chain-store distribution has grown from 5 or 6 percent 8 or 10 years ago up to 22 percent today; and if that tendency to keep on growing shall continue, it will not be long until just a few will have such large purchasing power that I am afraid combinations which ought to be allowed will not be able to compete with them.

While I do not think there is any conflict with the Senator's amendment, so far as I am concerned—I am speaking only for myself; I am not the author of the bill—I have not the slightest objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator being accepted as a part of the bill. I do not know just where it should go in; perhaps at the end of the bill, as a new section. Then it would be open to consideration by the House, and subject to consideration by a conference committee when that committee shall be appointed.

It may be that the Senator's bill is the better bill. I am not saying that it is not; but the thing that troubles me is the quantity discount in unlimited amounts.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not offering the amendment with the view that it would be accepted in lieu of the Robinson bill; but I should like, so far as it is possible, to have incorporated into law a positive prohibition covering certain of these practices, such as making allowances, and so forth. I should like to have that prohibition positive. I should like to have it so worded that if the prohibition is violated the person violating it may be taken into court. If a small merchant is compelled to come here from Omaha, or some other point in the Middle West, or any far distant point, and make his showing before the Federal Trade Commission, and get his relief, that in itself is a very burdensome requirement.

Mr. LOGAN. I agree with the Senator; but under the Robinson bill the merchant may bring suit in the courts to recover damages. However, the only question that arises in my mind just now is as to how the Senator's amendment should be included in the Robinson bill.

Mr. BORAH. I will offer it as a new section.

Mr. LOGAN. That would be satisfactory to me, I am quite sure.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. I was about to say that from what we know of the situation in the House they will probably offer their bill as a substitute for this measure.

The bill of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the bill offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] and myself, and the House measure will be in conference, and from those measures I should think some satisfactory law ought to be worked out.

Mr. LOGAN. I think that is true, Mr. President; and if I understand it, the entire bill, if that should happen, could be rewritten by the conferees, and such amendments as might be deemed necessary could be added by the conferees if the House should substitute its own bill. Then the whole thing would be open, as I understand.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho permit an interruption?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator perceive any incongruity between the bill which he has offered—and I refer particularly to the penal provision—and the so-called Robinson bill, where the remedy is by suit for damages, based upon whatever damages may be sustained by reason of so-called discrimination?

Mr. BORAH. My view is that there are certain practices so obviously improper and unjust that they ought to be prohibited by specific provision of law, and that indulging in them ought to constitute a crime. There are things like the granting of quantity discounts which are difficult to cover by a specific provision of law and make the violation punishable, but when we come to the special discount allowance, or rebate allowance, or service-charge allowance, or advertising allowance, to one party and the refusal of it to another, that is a fraudulent transaction.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that the Clayton Act, particularly section 2, and the Sherman antirust law, pretty effectively deal with the evils of which the Senator complains and which this proposed bill seeks to prevent.

Mr. BORAH. In a sense, that is correct, but when the businessman knows positively that if he does a thing he will be subject to criminal prosecution, that is a great deterrent. And it is not a thing about which he might be honestly misled. If he makes these allowances to one and refuses them to another, if he makes rebates to one and refuses them to another, it is a matter wholly within his knowledge, and done after full consideration and full knowledge of what he is doing.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to ask whether it is unusual to provide, for violation of a statute, a criminal prosecution and also a right to sue for damages? The two are not inconsistent.

Mr. BORAH. No; we have such a provision in the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. LOGAN. That is what I thought.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. So far as my memory extends, there is no specific penalty in the Clayton Antitrust Act for a violation of section 2, which, as the Senator knows, relates only to unfair price discriminations. The discrimination denounced is declared unlawful.

Mr. BORAH. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. It may be that under some general provision of law prosecution for a misdemeanor might be carried on, but no specific penalty is imposed. The remedy under the Clayton Act is that contained in section 4, which gives the party injured by reason of the unfair price discrimination the right to bring a suit to recover damages.

The remedy, of course, without some special provision such as that found in the pending bill, is inadequate. There is no presumption in section 4 of the Clayton Act of which the complainant may take advantage. The difficulty of establishing his case is often insurmountable.

A suggestion has been made that one of the defects of the pending bill is that it imposes no specific penalty for violation of its provisions. The suggestion in that connection is that the ordinary citizen who might have a complaint would find it difficult and very expensive to prosecute his complaint.

Mr. BORAH. That is my view.

Mr. ROBINSON. And that it might be preferable to impose a fine or imprisonment, or both, where the facts warranted such penalties, as a means of enforcing the law. I think that suggestion is very well worthy of consideration, and in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Utah I bring this question to his attention. What chance would an ordinary complainant have in an effort to recover damages against a gigantic concern which gets a 50-percent discount by reason of quantity discrimination? What chance would the ordinary complainant have of developing the facts essential to establish his complaint without the expenditure of a considerable sum of money?

I am unable to see, I will say to my friend the Senator from Utah, why it would not be just to impose a specific penalty for an act declared by the statute to be unlawful. I think it is true that when an act is declared to be unlawful under a general statute prosecution may be carried on, the penalty being specified in a general provision of law; not contained, so far as I remember, in the Clayton antitrust law, but in other provisions of the law penalties being made applicable in cases where acts are declared by statute to be unlawful.

One of the primary criticisms made against this bill is that it does not give the party in interest an adequate remedy in all cases. He suffers a hardship. He knows he is being imposed upon. He knows that the law is being violated, but he often endures the wrong rather than incur the expense of prosecuting a suit against a powerful antagonist, who has unlimited resources at his command and who can carry the case to all the courts, thus imposing on the opposing litigant great expense.

My view is that a specific penalty ought to be authorized which, whether fine or imprisonment, or both, in the judgment of the Senate would be fair and reasonable considering the nature of the act denounced.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think the fact that there is provided a specific penalty would of itself have a very great tendency to prevent such practices.

Mr. ROBINSON. It would put a burden on the Government to carry on a prosecution when facts came to the knowledge of its officers relating to violation of the statute.

Mr. BORAH. Quite true. To have the source of the dispensation of justice so far removed from the party interested as to make him unable to reach it is practically a denial of justice, and my idea was that there ought to be available to the small merchant not only the protection designed to be given, but at hand a means by which to enforce his rights. If we make it necessary for him to go one or two or three thousand miles in order to get his rights, he simply cannot get them. He cannot employ attorneys; he cannot get his witnesses; he cannot go to the expense of enforcing his rights. It certainly cannot be said to be harsh or unjust to parties interested on the other side, if they do the things prohibited, to subject them to the jurisdiction of the courts in the respective communities where they do these things.

Mr. President, I think I shall not, at this time at least, further discuss the pending amendment. Amendments to the amendment are now in order, are they not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Amendments to the amendment are in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. The committee amendment is the pending question, and it is subject to amendment.

Mr. BORAH. At this time I desire to offer as an amendment an additional section. I will ask the clerk to read it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment? I have an amendment to offer which I do not think will provoke any discussion. The Senator's amendment is much more important; it goes to the vitals of the bill. Has he any objection to my offering my amendment now?

Mr. BORAH. Not if it will not lead to discussion.

Mr. KING. If it does lead to discussion, I will withdraw it.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. KING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 8, after line 12, it is proposed to insert the following new subsection:

(e) Nothing in this section contained shall prevent the sale or purchase of crude mineral products or metals in the form in which they are loaded for shipment at prices on terms of sale based upon differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of such products, or that make only due allowance for differences in the cost of selling or transportation, or discrimination in the price of such products in the same or different communities made in good faith to meet competition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not think there is any objection to that amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. I should like to know what the amendment is intended to accomplish.

Mr. ROBINSON. We shall wish to consider the amendment. It cannot be adopted without some discussion. I myself wish to make some inquiries about it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of my promise to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I ask that my amendment lie on the table until after the amendment of the Senator from Idaho shall have been considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Utah will lie on the table, and the clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to add to the committee amendment a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to be a party to, or assist in, any transaction of sale, or contract to sell, which discriminates to his knowledge against competitors of the purchaser, in that, any discount, rebate, allowance, or advertising service charge is granted to the purchaser over and above any discount, rebate, allowance, or advertising service charge available at the time of such transaction to said competitors in respect of a sale of goods of like grade, quality, and quantity; to sell, or contract to sell, goods in any part of the United States at prices lower than those exacted by said person elsewhere in the United States for the purpose of destroying competition, or eliminating a competitor in such part of the United States; or, to sell, or contract to sell, goods at unreasonably low prices for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor.

Nothing in this section shall prevent a cooperative association from returning to producers or consumers, or a cooperative wholesale association from returning to its constituent retail members, the whole, or any part of, the net surplus resulting from its trading operations in proportion to purchases from, or sales to, the association.

Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 1 year, or both.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, is the Senator from Idaho asking for a vote on his amendment today?

Mr. BORAH. I certainly am.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho enlighten me as to whether it is intended by his amendment to make the penalty provisions in the last paragraph applicable to the entire bill, or merely to make them applicable to offenses against the provisions of this particular amendment?

Mr. BORAH. The penalty provisions are applicable to offenses against my particular amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, as the amendment is drafted it would be applicable, unless changed, to the entire section, and, with the light I now have on the subject, it is my opinion that it should be applicable to all of section 2.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, let me call the attention of the Senator to the language of the pending bill on page 6, which authorizes the Federal Trade Commission to conduct certain investigations and to fix quantity limits. If the penalty provision should be applicable to the entire section, would it not then have the effect of making criminal and assessing a criminal penalty against a violation of a discretionary order issued by the Federal Trade Commission?

Would not a violation of the Federal Trade Commission's order with respect to quantitative limits be a violation of a discretionary order of the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. ROBINSON. I misunderstood the Senator. Yes; it would.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator feel that we should go that far?

Mr. ROBINSON. Why not? We would wish to enforce the law if we wished to use the limitation of quantity discount as a means of preventing unfair discrimination.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. There is, however, apparently no limitation whatever upon the discretion of the Federal Trade Commission in inflicting the penalty provided for in the penalty clause.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, yes; there is.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I wish the Senator would point it out to me. I have been unable to find it.

Mr. ROBINSON. In my judgment, it is very clearly set forth on page 6, line 5, in the language—

> Where it finds that available purchasers in greater quantities are so few as to render differentials on account thereof unjustly discriminatory or promotive of monopoly in any line of commerce; and the foregoing shall then not be construed to permit differentials based on differences in quantities greater than those so fixed and established.

I see the point raised by the Senator from Wyoming. His point is, as I interpret it, that imposing a criminal penalty for the violation of an order of the Federal Trade Commission——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The character of which we do not know in advance, and which may change from day to day, or from month to month, and be different in one section of the country than in another.

Mr. ROBINSON. The rule for the Federal Trade Commission's action is fully specified. I should like to have the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky upon that point.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Who, for example, might determine what the word "few" means in this section; and what will guide the Federal Trade Commission in determining that the available purchasers are few?

Mr. LOGAN. That is found in the language under which the Commission must find that the purchasers are so few that those who have the large purchasing power tend to create a monopoly which tends to destroy competition.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator concede that we might find different rules in different sections of the country and in different businesses?

Mr. LOGAN. I think the circumstances naturally would differ.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator, then, feel that with such broad discretionary power vested in the Federal Trade Commission, we should make it a criminal offense, punishable by law, to violate an order which may vary to such a great extent?

Mr. LOGAN. We can only fix the quantity limits; and then, when the customers, or the people engaged in business, know what they are after they have been fixed, of course, there ought to be a criminal punishment if there is a violation of the law. That is about the safest way to notify people of what the law is. The Commission does not fix the limits from time to time. It establishes the quantity limits; and if there is a violation of the law, punishment may be inflicted.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I desire to point out what I consider some very material inconsistencies if the Borah amendment shall be added to the so-called Robinson bill.

If Senators will refer to page 5, they will find the language to which I have reference. I had previously marked it for criticism. In line 15 we find the language:

> Or prevent competition with any person who either grants or receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them.

My contention is that the purchaser cannot know what the seller is doing. He has no knowledge of the prices the seller may be making to numerous customers, and yet under this provision he is made equally guilty with the seller.

The provision in the amendment of the Senator from Idaho is, I think, better in that connection, because it says, on the top of page 2:

> Which discriminates to his knowledge against competitors of the purchaser.

It seems to me that if we are to punish the purchaser, he must have knowledge in advance of the discrimination; and that is not provided in the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, does the Senator think the word "knowingly" should precede the word "receives"?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I see no objection to that.

Mr. LOGAN. No; there is no objection to that.

Mr. COUZENS. In other words, a penalty is not to be inflicted unless the buyer knows what the seller is doing with respect to other customers.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think that is fair. Later I shall offer that amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, a short time ago I received a letter from Mr. Sheldon Wardwell, of Boston, who was at one time, and I think still is, the attorney for the Great Northern Paper Co., which has extensive newsprint mills in my State. He asked me certain questions about the Patman-Robinson bill, and in my reply to him I asked him to give me his opinion of the Robinson bill. I am going to read to the Senate what he says about the bill, as follows:

> MY DEAR SENATOR HALE: I appreciate your letter of April 23, with enclosed copies of the Robinson and other so-called chain-store bills.
> I am hardly an authority on the subject of antitrust legislation, but cannot help feeling grave concern over changes in these bills which would remove from the Clayton Act the exception allowing "discrimination in price * * * made in good faith to meet competition."
> As you know, the newsprint industry of this country is now manufacturing only about 28 percent of the United States production, our production having dropped from about 1,700,000 tons in 1926 to approximately 900,000 tons per annum current. This difference amounts to over 1,800,000 man-days of employment per year in the woods and mills, to say nothing of indirect employment. It deprives our carriers of at least 2,000,000 revenue tons per year. All Government projects and relief expenditures in the State of Maine do not make up the loss to the State which is caused by this industrial dislocation.
> The reasons for loss of United States tonnage are well known. Price cutting by European and Canadian mills has been made possible by the policies of foreign governments, cheap labor, cheap wood (subsidized in Canada by the provisional governments), and cheap transportation. Our Government, on the other hand, has passed laws which restrict our industry by increasing the cost of labor and of transportation.
> The net result is that foreign manufacturers have stolen our markets, and such mills as remain can only distribute within rather confined areas. Twenty years ago State of Maine mills used to ship as far west as Texas common points. They have been driven out of the Southwest and largely out of the South, at least as far north as the Ohio River, by water-borne tonnage from Scandinavia, Newfoundland, and British Columbia, and they cannot cross the Mississippi by reason of competition from the western Ontario mills. They are faced with intensive competition on the North Atlantic coast, by water competition from Canada and Europe, with freight rates lower to New York from Europe than from the State of Maine.
> Central Freight Association territory (west of the Buffalo-Pittsburgh line) is the last frontier; and even there, owing to policy of Canadian carriers, previous rate relationships have been so dislocated that tonnage is being diverted to the Canadian mills. None of these conditions are economic; they are artificial, created by law or administrative policy, with foreign governments helping their manufacturers and our Government handicapping its manufacturers.
> The relation of this preamble to the Robinson bill involves no strain on the imagination. Foreign manufacturers making in excess of 70 percent of the tonnage available for consumption of the United States will not be governed by the bill and cannot be governed. Their contracts are basically origin delivery. They can commit acts which under the bill would be discriminatory if committed by a mill located in this country. They can combine to raise or depress prices in any particular market or to our markets as a whole. Our manufacturers, on the other hand, will be threatened with threefold damages at the best, and at the worst imprisonment, for meeting competitive prices in such narrow markets as are left.
> As an illustration, the present newsprint price in both New York and Chicago is $41. The freight rate Millinocket to New York is $5.60 per ton. Freight rate Millinocket to Chicago is $8.40 per ton, and from Canadian group mills to Chicago $5.60 a ton, a difference of $2.80 per ton in favor of the eastern Canadian group mills, although only a little over a year ago we were on parity to Chicago.
> With newsprint mills losing money, we cannot afford to meet this price differential at Chicago, but we do still reach intermediate points where disadvantages are not so great even though in favor of Canada.
> If the Robinson bill is passed and we could not meet competition without lowering prices to New York and points intermediate to Chicago, it would mean that our mills would have to go out of business. Tonnage cannot be replaced in the East in the face of existing competition, and must be placed in more distant markets at such competitive prices as prevail.
> You many think that I am confusing the Robinson bill and the anti-basing-point bills, but one of the principal reasons for striking out the competitive proviso of the Clayton Act is quite in line with the anti-basing-point idea. This is explained on page 4 of the report of the committee (no. 1502) accompanying the Robinson bill.

In the last analysis, this bill would leave our foreign competitors in the position where they could establish a zone system of prices confining our mills to their own front yards and competing with them within that area without themselves observing the provisions of the bill. The result will be that instead of encouraging competition by allowing us access to markets, competition will be prohibitive, and such newsprint tonnage as is left to this country will pass into the hands of foreign competitors not subject to our antitrust laws. The final result will be that, having eliminated competition from United States mills, foreign competitors can and will enter into price-control agreements such as are now proposed in Canada.

Very truly yours.

Mr. President, I am willing to have enacted reasonable laws that will prevent monopoly; I am willing to have passed laws that will encourage fair trade practices; but I am not willing to have passed laws that will put out of business one of the greatest, if not the greatest, industry in my State.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho whether his amendment would affect the situation in regard to this company.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in my opinion, the Senator's constituents would not be affected by this amendment. The amendment simply provides that discounts, rebates, allowances, or advertising-service charges shall not be granted to one purchaser without allowing them to another. That is not at all the trouble which confronts the Senator's constituents, as outlined in the letter he has read.

Mr. HALE. Then, the Senator's amendment would not affect them?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think so.

Mr. HALE. That is what I supposed, but the so-called Robinson bill, of course, would, if enacted, affect them very seriously.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I discussed with the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Kentucky this morning a brief amendment designed to illuminate the apparently intended meaning of the bill. I should like to offer the amendment now. It is my understanding it is not the purpose of the Robinson bill to prevent discrimination in price by reason of the difference in the quantity of the commodity sold in respect to the industrial-production activities of the country. I am told by both the able Senator from Arkansas and the able Senator from Kentucky that that is the fact. I have submitted this amendment to them, and they have indicated a willingness to take it to conference for further consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I find that there are several amendments yet to be proposed. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan to have his amendment printed, and also to ask other Senators who are in position to do so and who desire to present amendments to have them printed so that they may be available for the study of Senators in the further consideration of the bill.

I am advised that the bill cannot be brought to a conclusion this evening, because some amendments have not as yet been prepared, which their proponents desire to offer. So if Senators will be good enough to submit their amendments and have them printed it will facilitate a conclusion of the bill tomorrow, and we may then be able to devote the remaining days of the week to office business.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator would not object to letting my amendment stand as pending?

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no; it may be the pending amendment, and I do not know that I shall make any objection to it, but I should like to reserve the right to do so.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for the purpose of permitting me to send up some amendments which I desire to offer and which I should like to have printed in pursuance of the suggestion made?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. I send to the desk certain amendments to the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received and printed and lie on the table.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, some time ago I had an amendment printed, and I understand the Senator from Kentucky has no objection to it. Is there objection to having that amendment considered now, or does the Senator want me to withhold it?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not had an opportunity of seeing the amendment recently, and I believe I will ask the Senator to let it go over until tomorrow. It has been printed, I understand.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. It was printed on the 21st day of February.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that he present and have acted upon the amendment which was suggested by the Senator from Michigan [Mr COUZENS] to insert the word "knowingly" at the place designated by him.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think that advisable; and so, Mr. President, at the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] I move, on page 5, line 16, after the word "or", to insert the word "knowingly", so that it will read "either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the King of kings and the Lord of lords, we praise Thee that the rich and poor, the high and lowly, the good and bad may call Thee "Father." Thou, whose essence is love, to whom discord and sin are abhorrent, teach us the art of brotherly love. May we reflect it in the home, in society, and in the affairs of state. We thank Thee for the pure, noble, and self-sacrificing life of Jesus of Nazareth. We pray Thee that we may be brought in contact with the life-giving currents of His marvelous life. That our lives may be obedient and Godlike, we entreat Thee to make us susceptible to His holy will, and Thine shall be the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill and concurrent resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2883. An act to provide for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories; and

S. Con. Res. 37. Concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of additional copies of each part of Senate Report No. 944, concerning the manufacture and sale of arms and other war munitions.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10489) entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding and settlement of the city of New Rochelle, N. Y."

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 267) entitled "An act for the relief of certain officers and employees of the Foreign Service of the United States who, while in the course of their respective duties, suffered losses of personal property by reason of catastrophes of nature", requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. BULKLEY, and Mr. WHITE to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA AIRPORT COMMISSION

The SPEAKER announced, pursuant to provisions of Public Law No. 529, Seventy-fourth Congress, the appointment of Mrs. NORTON, Mr. NICHOLS, and Mr. COLE of New York as members of the District of Columbia Airport Commission.

WHY PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT SHOULD BE REELECTED

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a radio speech made by me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the radio on April 24:

I recall vividly the occasion of President Roosevelt's inauguration. It was a gloomy day in more respects than one. Thousands of people were standing in front of the inaugural stand awaiting the arrival of a new leader. Despair was written upon every face. Fear gripped every heart. Many thought that we were on the verge of economic collapse. The banks were closed. Terrified people were standing in line in front of the Treasury to convert their paper currency into gold. Millions were jobless and hungry, while other millions faced bankruptcy and foreclosures. Homes and farms were being sold under the hammer. Agricultural products glutted the market, and the price of cotton was 5 cents a pound. Old age faced want and poverty without a single ray of hope. Youth saw the doors of opportunity closed to ambition and energy. When President Roosevelt faced that despairing multitude who symbolized the majority of our people he knew what was in their hearts and minds. Then he did something I shall never forget to my dying day. He smiled. If ever a nation needed a smile it was on that gloomy day. Not only did he smile but he spoke with cheerfulness and optimism. That smile and cheerfulness melted the icy fear that had paralyzed the hearts of a stricken people.

When we Democrats began the difficult task of recovery we had before us a map which outlined the course of action and policy. That map was the party platform. No one can deny that we made a sincere effort to steer the ship of state according to that chart. We reorganized the banking structure upon a sound basis. We passed a drastic economy bill which provoked widespread opposition. But it soon became apparent to every thinking man that if we adhered to that chartered course we would run headlong into a hurricane that would smash the ship of state against the rocks.

To those who condemn us for temporarily departing from that chart, may I propose this question: Suppose that the captain of a ship set sail upon a charted course and after proceeding for 100 miles received warning of a hurricane directly ahead, would it not be his duty to deviate from the original course to save the ship and all on board? That is exactly what we did. We received the most serious storm warning. The barometer was falling steadily; the gale was increasing with alarming rapidity. Even a landlubber could interpret the signs of the approaching tempest. Unemployment was rapidly increasing. Food riots were breaking out. More and more homes and farms were going under the hammer. The American dollar was attacked by all foreign currencies. Export trade was vanishing. General paralysis was spreading over the entire economic body. To aggravate this situation fire broke out on the ship of state. At this critical juncture President Roosevelt acted with decision and promptness. He steered the ship as far from the troubled area as possible and ordered vigorous and direct measures to extinguish the fire. Not a human soul on board protested these orders or suggested a substitute. The majority of the passengers volunteered their assistance to extinguish the fire. Some of them, however, hid in the hold of the ship or locked themselves in their staterooms. The President issued a series of emergency orders in rapid-fire succession. First, he ordered that the hungry be fed and the naked clothed and that Government jobs be created for as many as possible. Then we stopped the raids upon the gold supply by doing what Europe had already done—by going off the gold standard and devaluing the gold dollar. We extended the principle of the R. F. C. loans to include home and farm owners, with the result that millions of homes were saved from the sheriff's hammer. We applied the tariff principle to agriculture, with the result that the farm income has increased 52 percent over 1933.

I do not say that in our haste to stop the progress of the fire we did not make mistakes. No doubt we tore away sound planks. Was a fire ever extinguished without wasting water? But it must be remembered that we were dealing with a grave emergency that would not brook delay nor tolerate lengthy debate. We were unprepared; our equipment was inadequate and we had too few trained firemen. But let it be remembered that during this critical time no one came forward with a better plan. Everyone was content to leave to Roosevelt and Congress the responsibility of guiding the ship. When the fire was brought under control and the storm began to moderate, a strange thing happened. The passengers who had hidden in their staterooms or in the hold of the ship came on deck, surveyed the severed planks and the water-soaked compartments and exclaimed, "We do not approve of the way you brought this fire under control and we condemn you for leaving the chartered course." From every quarter of the Republic politicians are coming out of their staterooms and saying that we were not good firemen and sailors, and that they should be allowed to steer the ship into the placid waters of approaching recovery. Yet when the storm and fire were raging we received not one word of constructive suggestions from this critical crowd. It is much easier to say now what should have been done than it was at that time, because hindsight is always better and clearer than foresight.

My friends, I know it to be a fact that the President welcomes constructive criticism. He does not claim to be perfect. He has freely admitted that if he could be right 75 percent of the time he would consider himself fortunate. But constructive criticism must not only point out in black and white where we erred but it must offer something better in the place of that which is condemned. To these critics of the New Deal who now condemn the way the captain, first mate, and we ordinary sailors ran the ship during this grave emergency, let me issue this challange: Why didn't you give helpful suggestions during the emergency? Why were you silent then? I challenge you to name in black and white each and every bill we passed and each and every step we took which you now condemn, and state specifically what you would have done under the same circumstances. Anyone can tear down a house but it takes a carpenter to build one. It is equally unfair to praise the captain of the ship but condemn the sailors who followed his orders and fully cooperated with him. Without the sailors the captain would have been helpless. Therefore, any endorsement of the President and his program must include us Congressmen who cooperated with the President and made possible the success of his program. It is cheap and cowardly to denounce the sailors for want of courage to condemn the captain. Although we have been compelled to resort to drastic measures to halt the fire, no Democrat intends to continue these emergencies after the fire is extinguished. While the patient is suffering it is justifiable to administer morphine, but it is the duty of the doctor to cease the dope as soon as possible. We must not allow this Nation to become an addict to the dole. But some of the remedies proposed by our critics are no immediate answer to empty stomachs and embittered hearts.

Whatever else may be said by our critics, it must be conceded that the President has furnished the Nation with the highest type of honest and fearless leadership. When he has proposed legislation such as the old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, public works, relief, and other similar measures necessitating the appropriation of additional money he has had the courage to tell Congress where to get the money. On the eve of an election he has had the courage and honesty to propose a concrete and definite tax bill to raise the money to pay pensions to the aged and furnish relief and jobs for the unemployed. How many public officials would have demonstrated this courage? The cowardly, time-serving, and insincere public official would have postponed the tax bill until after the election. The cheap politician would have merely asked Congress for the money without having the moral and political courage to tell Congress specifically where to get it. This is the sure test between statesmanship and demagoguery, between courage and cowardice, between sincerity and hypocrisy.

We are approaching another national election. Every indication points to the fact that our enemies will engage in mud slinging and personalities. Already some of the enemies of this administration are conducting a whispering campaign against the President and his family. A typical lie that is being circulated is that the President is in league with Astor and Barney Baruch to promote the interest of certain powerful corporations. Mud slinging should not be tolerated in a political campaign. No one but political scavengers seek to besmear with their filth the fair name of an opponent. When candidates or their friends resort to mud slinging and personalities they immediately confess the weakness of their cause, the poverty of their thoughts, and the rottenness of their characters. I respect a thief infinitely more than I do reputation slanderers and character assassins. As Shakespeare said, "He who steals my purse steals trash, but he who filches from me my good name robs me of that which does not enrich him, but makes me poor indeed." These vile creatures of the sewer who seek to defame the reputation of faithful and honest public servants should be avoided by all honest men and branded for what they are.

No man has ever demonstrated more completely his independence and honesty than Franklin D. Roosevelt. There may be doubts as to where some candidates get their money to finance campaigns. We may have serious doubts as to the honesty of a candidate who never made anything but a living and who is able to make several expensive campaigns in succession. We may even be morally certain that selfish interests are financing his campaign; but not so with Franklin D. Roosevelt. We know where every dollar came from to finance his campaign. No one can deny that the President's program is in every respect free from the influence or dictation of big business or self-seeking interests.

The President has devoted himself exclusively to the tasks of recovery and needed reforms. He is not spending his time running around over the country delivering graduation and picnic speeches, dodging and ducking controversial subjects, handshaking, and back slapping, and seeking to build up his political fences.

It is charged that we have violated the Democratic principle of State rights. My friends, we believe in State rights, but we are against State wrongs.

In conclusion, my friends, let us keep in the White House one who puts the interest of the plain people above every political consideration, one who has remained continuously at his post of duty while others were building up their political fences, one who is free and independent and whose election was not financed by the tainted money of privilege-seeking interests, one who has never resorted to mud slinging and personalities and who has always conducted his campaigns on a high plane of respectability, one who does not use his high office as a means of financial enrichment for himself, his family, or friends, one who does not work through kitchen cabinets and underground passages, but always in the open, one whose honesty is above suspicion and who does not play secretly with the enemies of the people while pretending to be their friend.

In short, my friends, let us keep in the White House that great leader of the plain people, the Jefferson and Jackson of the twentieth century, our present and our future President, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

THE RIVERS AND HARBORS ACT OF 1935—THE MOST COMPREHENSIVE AND CONSTRUCTIVE WATERWAY LEGISLATION EVER ENACTED BY THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a speech delivered by me at the National Rivers and Harbors Conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress in Washington on Monday, April 27, 1936:

Mr. President and delegates to the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, it is a great privilege to have the opportunity again of addressing you on the subject of our great national assets, our rivers and harbors, and to invite your attention particularly to the comprehensive and constructive waterway program adopted by legislation since your last annual meeting. Our interest in this subject is one of long standing, extending in your case from your first convention in Baltimore in 1901, and in my case over a period of some 19 years as a member of the Committees on Flood Control and Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, including 5 years as chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee.

Last year I traced briefly the history of the development of our national policy for improvement of rivers and harbors, emphasizing that this policy is the result of more than a century of carefully considered legislation. Our Nation-wide plans have been clearly and skillfully worked out, and it is for these that Congress provides appropriations. The waterway improvements that have been made possible through these appropriations play an important part in the daily life of every citizen. The average person may easily prove this to his own satisfaction by noting in the course of a day the large number of necessities and luxuries he might be forced to do without were it not for the development and improvement of water-borne transportation. It is hardly necessary to recount for you the many large American cities, both coastal and inland, that owe their growth and commercial development to the improvement of navigational facilities by the United States Government. Last year the Chief of Engineers told us that prior to 1928 the annual appropriation for the maintenance and improvement of our rivers and harbors had averaged from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000, and that in the 5 years preceding the National Industrial Recovery Act approximately $400,000,000 were expended on rivers and harbors. Considerable amounts have since been made available from emergency relief funds.

The rate of growth of waterway improvement and development is now at an all-time maximum. The River and Harbor Act approved by the President on August 30, 1935, was the greatest piece of constructive legislation ever passed for such improvements. On this our first meeting since the passage of that act, I believe it appropriate to invite attention to some of its salient features.

The act of 1935 authorized 246 projects for improvement, having an aggregate cost to complete of over $660,000,000. It legalized by congressional act a number of projects that had been commenced with emergency relief funds. In addition, the act authorized some 270 preliminary surveys and examinations, and section 6 of the act provided that the surveys authorized pursuant to section 1 of the River and Harbor Act of January 21, 1927, and House Document

No. 308 (69th Cong., 1st sess.) should be supplemented by such additional studies or investigations as the Chief of Engineers might find necessary to take into account important changes in economic factors as they occurred, as well as additional streamflow records or other factual data.

A recapitulation of the projects adopted shows that 36 States are benefited directly with one or more projects located either wholly or partially within such States. It is safe to assume that the remaining 12 States derive a considerable measure of indirect benefits. In addition to the projects located within the continental United States, there are 11 in Alaska, 3 in Hawaii, and 4 in Puerto Rico. There has never before been a river and harbor act that has provided for such widespread and beneficial improvements over the entire country, extending from the Gulf to the Canadian border and from the Atlantic to the Pacific Oceans.

We have not the time to describe the merits of all the 246 projects adopted by the River and Harbor Act of 1935, so I will invite your attention to only a few of the most noteworthy ones.

Upon the North Atlantic coast there is the important Cape Cod Canal improvement. The old Cape Cod Canal was limited in its usefulness because of a depth preventing use by ships of more than 20 feet draft. The new project provides for dredging a sea-level canal 32 feet deep and 500 feet wide, with a harbor of refuge for small vessels. Traffic has been increasing through this waterway because it affords a protected route for coastwise shipping, which is 65 miles shorter than the route around the cape through the dangerous waters of Nantucket and Vineyard Sounds and 165 miles shorter than the open sea route around Nantucket Shoals. This project will effect large savings in transportation costs.

Further southward on the Atlantic coast we have the Delaware River-Chesapeake Bay Ship Canal. The new project provides for enlargement of the old barge canal, with a present depth of 12 feet, into a ship canal 27 feet deep and from 250 to 400 feet wide. This improvement will permit shipping to move directly from the Delaware River to Chesapeake Bay, thereby saving about 316 miles in the normal run between Baltimore and Philadelphia and about 179 miles between Baltimore and New York. The savings translated into money will represent large sums annually.

In addition to the above, the bill authorized a number of smaller projects on the Atlantic coast from Maine to Florida which are equally meritorious and productive of actual value to the public, although not so large individually.

A great many desirable improvements provided for in the bill are in the rapidly developing Gulf coastal area. These include the important improvements provided for at Tampa Harbor in Florida; the improvement and extension of the intracoastal waterway from the Apalachicola River to Pensacola Bay; and the improvement of the navigational facilities of the Warrior-Tombigbee River system in Alabama, which serves a vast hinterland in Alabama and Mississippi. Work provided for along the Gulf coast in Louisiana includes the improvement of six smaller waterways which connect with extensive agricultural regions, sea-food industries, and oil fields.

Along the reach of coast line lying in the great State of Texas we find a number of improvements which will materially aid the progress of that section. Among these is the Sabine-Neches waterway. This waterway affords ocean navigation to an important industrial region in eastern Texas and western Louisiana. Commerce, which is principally in petroleum and petroleum products to and from refineries on this waterway, has been steadily increasing from about 12,000,000 tons in 1921 to about 28,000,000 tons in 1933. The new project will provide ample depths so that oil tankers can be fully loaded to utilize their maximum capacities. Large savings will accrue from this improvement.

Other meritorious improvements are being made in Houston, Galveston, and Texas City to enlarge and improve the navigational facilities of these important ports. The project for the construction of groins to protect the Galveston sea wall from damage due to erosion is unique. This wall, constructed in part by the Government after the disaster at Galveston in 1900, was found to be in danger, and its protection by groins was considered essential in order that another hurricane might not find the wall undermined and ineffective to afford the necessary protection of that great commercial city.

The projects for the improvement of Freeport Harbor, Port Aransas, and of the channel from Aransas Pass to Corpus Christi were also included in the bill and should prove of great value to the west Texas coastal area.

Proceeding to a consideration of our inland waterways we find that several large improvements looking to the completion of our river transportation system have been authorized. Prominent among these is the project for 9-foot navigation on the upper Mississippi River between the mouth of the Missouri River and Minneapolis. Experience had demonstrated the impracticability under natural low-water flow conditions of obtaining and operating a 9-foot channel by dredging and regulation. The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors therefore recommended canalization as the most feasible and economical method of attaining this end.

Construction of the necessary locks and dams for this project has been carried on with emergency relief appropriations, and the River and Harbor Act authorizes a continuation of this work. The execution of this great project has contributed materially to the relief of unemployment. It is a vital part of the final development of navigation on the Mississippi River system, and from it large savings in transportation costs will accrue to the people of the entire Mississippi Valley.

The Missouri River has been improved from its mouth to Kansas City by dredging and regulating works and is now open for 6-foot navigation throughout the year. Work on the Kansas City-Sioux City reach has been advanced to above Omaha. The navigable depths will be increased to provide an 8- to 9-foot channel when the water supply of the Fort Peck Reservoir becomes available. Work on this reservoir was pushed vigorously under emergency relief appropriations, and the project was adopted by Congress in the act of 1935. In an era noted for its great dams, the Fort Peck project on the Missouri River near Glasgow, Mont., takes rank with the largest. This dam forms a reservoir of 19,500,000 acre-feet capacity; a lake 185 miles long with an area of 245,000 acres. Incidental benefits which will result from the improvement of the Missouri River by the Fort Peck Dam are material and supplemental to the benefits of the improvement for navigation. The increased water supply from Fort Peck during the low-water season will make available additional water for municipal and industrial purposes, will decrease the pollution of the river, and the dam will practically eliminate flood damages along the upper Missouri River.

In the Ohio River Basin the last river and harbor act authorizes a number of projects which will prove of value to this highly industrialized region. Among these is the improvement of the Kanawha River, where modern 9-foot navigation is provided by the construction of two high dams, which will replace nine obsolete, low structures. These works will greatly improve operating conditions and the general usefulness of this important tributary of the Ohio system.

The network of inland waterways in the basin of the Mississippi and its tributaries would be incomplete without suitable connections with the basin of the Great Lakes. The Illinois River provides the final link in a Lakes-to-Gulf trunk waterway. Locks constructed under the old project are inadequate in size for present-day river transportation. New locks have now been authorized at La Grange and Peoria, which with some supplemental dredging will provide a modern 9-foot navigation channel. The prospective commerce on the Illinois River, after improvement, is large, and commensurate transportation savings will result in great benefits to the public. At the Great Lakes end of this waterway the authorized Calumet-Sag Channel in Illinois will provide for suitable terminal development.

In the Great Lakes Basin itself improvements have been authorized for some 44 lake harbors and for numerous channels. Improvements at these harbors consist generally of breakwaters and the widening and deepening of harbor channels to meet the needs of modern deep-draft lake navigation. These improvements are much needed and will affect large savings in transportation throughout the area from New York to Minnesota. The deepening of the Great Lakes connecting channels, which is being completed, is a most important feature of this work. Adequate depths will be provided for large lake freight carriers of 24-foot draft through all connecting channels, including St. Clair River and the Straits of Mackinac.

Another project of national importance is the Great Lakes-Hudson River waterway which has been handicapped by a limited depth of 12 feet as compared with 14 feet in the competitive Canadian channels and on the St. Lawrence River. The new work, which is being financed by the United States and executed under Federal control, provides for the improvement of that portion of the canal connecting Lake Ontario with the Hudson River by deepening between the locks to 14 feet and increasing overhead clearances to a minimum of 20 feet. The commerce on these canals has been steadily increasing and their improvement will provide adequate water transportation between the Lakes and the Atlantic seaboard at New York.

On the Pacific coast the River and Harbor Act of 1935 includes the improvement of nine important harbors in California as well as improvements in river and connecting channels. Federal navigation and flood-control projects are now underway on the Sacramento River. The flood-control project is about 70 percent complete. The last river and harbor act authorized Federal participation in the construction of a large dam at the Kennett site on the Sacramento River. This dam will directly benefit navigation by providing a steady and increased low water flow, and incidentally it will provide for the storage of flood waters, and will prevent the intrusion of salt water into the lower Sacramento.

A project in the Sacramento River Basin has been developed by the California Debris Commission and has been authorized subject to modifications which may be approved by the Chief of Engineers. It provides for the construction of restraining dams on the Yuba, Bear, and American Rivers. These works will prevent the entry of mining debris into the navigable channels below, and will prevent flooding of agricultural lands by reason of the choking of flood channels with mining debris. Works of this nature should permit the continuation of mining operations without menace to the usefulness of the natural waterways.

About 20 new projects which were found desirable along the North Pacific coast in Washington and Oregon, including works on the Columbia River, have been authorized. These are mostly improvements of harbors by breakwaters and channel deepening where such improvements seemed necessary to the development of commerce. One of the most conspicuous projects in the Pacific Northwest is the Bonneville Dam on the Columbia River. This dam, with navigation locks, is a part of the plan for the most effective improvement of the Columbia River for navigation, in combination with power development, flood control, and the needs of irrigation. The project was started with emergency relief funds and has now been authorized for completion by the River and Harbor Act of 1935.

Many causes induced the Thirteen Original States to change from a loose confederation, as it existed during and immediately subsequent to the Revolution, into a firmer and more perfect Union, but there was none, perhaps, so potent as the generally recognized necessity for better central governmental regulation and control of interstate trade and traffic (principally navigation at that time). This seems to have inspired the incipient measures, the first concerted movement, which resulted in the adoption of the present Constitution of the United States. At the city of Annapolis, in the month of September 1786, a meeting of commissioners appointed by some of the principal States was held "to take into consideration the trade and commerce of the United States; to consider how far a uniform system in their commercial intercourse and regulations might be necessary to their common interest and permanent harmony; and to report to the several States such an act relative to this great project as, when unanimously ratified by them, would enable the United States in Congress assembled effectually to provide for the same."

This meeting, which was attended by many able men including James Madison and Alexander Hamilton, without attempting any definite action, adopted an address to the States recommending a future convention with enlarged powers for forming a Constitution. As one of the reasons for this recommendation the commissioners say that "in the course of their reflections on the subject they have been induced to think that the power of regulating trade is of such comprehensive extent and will enter so far into the general system of the Federal Government that to give it efficacy and to obviate questions and doubts concerning its precise nature and limits, may require a correspondent adjustment of other parts of the Federal system." Out of this recommendation came the Constitution of the United States, and thus the great original and moving object of its establishment was to confer on the General Government the power to regulate commerce.

The Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress the power "To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes", and by this provision there was transferred from the States to the Federal Government the control of all the navigable waters of the Nation for the purpose of navigation. At first it was seriously doubted whether the power to regulate comprehended the right to improve—that is, whether the improvement of rivers and harbors was a subject of national concern and of constitutional appropriation. Mr. Madison as President in 1817 vetoed a bill for internal improvements, including, among other things, a waterway improvement. He stated in his message that the Constitution did not vest power in Congress for such purpose.

In May 1824, Congress passed the first distinct act to improve navigation, entitled "an act to improve the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers." About this time the decision of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, established unquestionably the exclusive power of Congress with respect to the interstate waterways of the country, and removed completely the doubts of earlier years. This was the case referred to by General Markham, in his splendid address, as marking the birth of a permanent Federal policy of river and harbor improvement, a policy which has grown from year to year with the advance of population and the increasing needs of commercial transportation.

Gibbons v. Ogden was one of the most noted cases ever coming before the Supreme Court, not only on account of the great issue involved but also on account of the great prominence of all the persons concerned. Gibbons was ex-mayor of Savannah, Ga., and also maintained residence in New Jersey. He was locally and nationally prominent. Ogden had been Governor of New Jersey and United States Senator from that State, and both Gibbons and Ogden had been prominent in promoting navigation. The attorneys employed in the case were both nationally and internationally known. Gibbons was represented by Daniel Webster, and by William Wirt, then Attorney General of the United States, and famed as the prosecutor of Aaron Burr. Ogden was represented by Pinckney, of Maryland, and Thomas J. Oakley, attorney general of New York. He was also represented by Thomas A. Emmet, the great Irish patriot.

Gibbons and Ogden had been partners, but their partnership had ceased before the beginning of this litigation. Fulton and Livingston, who developed the Clermont, the first steamboat to be successfully navigated, had obtained from the State of New York the exclusive privilege of operating boats propelled by steam upon the navigable waters of that State. Ogden became the assignee of those gentlemen for this privilege and under it was operating boats between New York and Elizabethtown, N. J. Gibbons was also operating boats on the same waters under permit of the Federal Government. Ogden enjoined him from navigating his boats across the State line into the State of New York. This injunction was affirmed by the Supreme Court of New York. Gibbons carried the litigation into the Federal courts upon the ground that the law of New York, under which he was excluded, was in violation of the Constitution of the United States, in which the Federal Government was given full power over interstate commerce. Chief Justice Marshall sustained this plea in one of the most noted decisions ever emanating from that Court.

It may be of interest to note the condition in which shipping had been placed by the several States acting independently. While New York prohibited boats to enter her navigable waters without a permit under the sanction of the Fulton and Livingston privilege granted, neighboring States enacted retaliatory measures. Connecticut enacted a law prohibiting boats from entering the waters of that State if they held such licenses from New York. By the law of New Jersey, if any citizen of that State should be restrained under the New York law, the courts of New Jersey would be given jurisdiction on action for damage, with treble costs against the party seeking such restraint. This was termed an "Act of retortion against the illegal and oppressive legislation of New York." Other States had enacted somewhat similar retaliatory measures. From this it will be seen that commerce between the States would be impossible unless regulated by the Federal Government as provided in the Constitution. Chief Justice Marshall, in sustaining the Constitution of the United States in this decision, made interstate commerce possible and practicable.

During all the years prior to the River and Harbor Act of 1935, in which waterway improvements have been prosecuted by the Federal Government, the jurisdiction over these works was not assigned by statute to an executive department or agency. Each river and harbor bill authorized prosecution under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers without permanently establishing the jurisdiction of the War Department.

When the River and Harbor Act of 1935 was under consideration by the Commerce Committee of the Senate the question of the costs of public construction by the Army Engineers was brought up. The Chief of Engineers, in testifying before the Commerce Committee, submitted a series of tabulations, showing for a large number of jobs all over the United States, the range of bids, the Government estimates, the contract prices, the Government cost on the contracts, and the total cost of contracts. The summation of the figures showed that the total bids ranged from $130,000,000 to $175,000,000. The total Government estimate was $147,000,000; contract price total was $130,000,000; Government cost of inspection, supervision, etc., on contract was $10,000,000, making the total cost by contract $140,000,000. These figures clearly demonstrated the efficiency and economy which had always obtained in the construction of waterway improvements by the Army Engineers.

The Commerce Committee of the Senate decided that, in addition to authorizing specific investigations and construction by the Federal Government, permanent statutory authority should be given to the agency charged with these investigations and improvements. A clause was therefore added to the bill which makes the Corps of Engineers of the Army under the direction of the Secretary of War the statutory agency to execute and maintain river and harbor improvements by the Federal Government. This clause reads as follows:

"That hereafter Federal investigation and improvements of rivers, harbors, and other waterways shall be under the jurisdiction of and shall be prosecuted by the War Department under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers except as otherwise specifically provided by act of Congress."

The waterway investigations and improvements of the United States have been carried on for over 100 years in an exemplary manner by the Army Engineers of the War Department. No other activity of the Federal Government has been so efficiently and economically administered. Within the last 8 or 9 years practically all of the streams of the country have been surveyed and plans have been prepared by the War Department Engineers for their improvement for navigation, for flood control, for the development of hydroelectric power and for irrigation. The reports submitted to Congress are most thorough, and constitute a comprehensive plan for the development of these resources of the Nation over a long period of time. The War Department deserves great credit for this magnificent piece of planning.

In order that the investigations made and the plans prepared shall be kept up to date and ever ready for use, it was advisable that this activity should be assigned by act of Congress to the War Department. It is equally important that the prosecution of waterway improvements should be similarly placed under the jurisdiction of the War Department. These provisions were advisable in the interest of coordination and economy.

The long experience of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress makes it unnecessary for me to tell you that no body of men can render such unselfish and earnest devotion of service to the country as is given by the Engineers of the War Department. This service is the natural consequence of the education and training of these public servants. The group of men that have planned and prosecuted river and harbor improvements so well in the past includes civilian engineers of the highest types, and these are imbued with the spirit of the commissioned officers with whom they work, so that the organization as a whole works to the maximum advantage of the Government. The country is fortunate in having the wisdom to use the Army Engineer organization for the planning and prosecution of its waterway improvements, and no one knows better than the membership of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress that this public activity has properly been assigned by statute to be under the jurisdiction of the War Department.

During the depression and emergency caused by depression, public works were carried on with lump-sum appropriations allocated by the President. We all know how well the Chief Executive provided for the continuation of water improvements so as to avoid interruption of the general plans and policies established by Congress. After the depression Congress assumed its duties with respect to waterway improvements and passed the most comprehensive and constructive waterway legislation ever enacted by the Congress of the United States, viz, the River and Harbor Act of 1935. In the War Department appropriation bill now nearing its legislative consummation, funds are provided for prosecuting the improvements authorized in last year's river and harbor bill. I am gratified to be able to thus assure this National Rivers and Harbors Congress that proper progress in carrying on our national program for waterway improvements is now a practical accomplishment.

P. W. A. WATERWORKS PROGRAM AID TO RECOVERY

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Public Works Administration's waterworks program and also to extend my remarks in the RECORD in connection with the death of our late colleague, Hon. Stephen A. Rudd.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the requests of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, the Public Works Administration has made possible construction of approximately 2,000 waterworks and related projects in cities and towns of every 1 of the 48 States.

It devoted 25 percent of its non-Federal program to this form of public improvement:

First. To reduce unemployment both in the community and in heavy industries—the twofold universal P. W. A. objective.

Second. To furnish pure water to promote public health.

Third. To reduce fire-insurance rates and hazards.

Fourth. To provide for community growth and expansion and thus strengthen real property values to broaden the base for future taxation.

Now nearly all communities in the United States of more than 10,000 population have "satisfactory" water systems; a majority of more than 5,000 have similar systems due to this 2½-year transformation.

This transition in American waterworks was first inspired in June 1933 when Public Works Administration instilled confidence by offering encouragement in the way of loans and grants to villages, cities, counties, and States to increase and purify water supplies.

Throughout every State of the Union there developed comparatively quickly a multitude of new or renovated filtration plants, softening plants, reservoirs, distribution piping systems, intakes, dams, elevated tower storage tanks, sewage systems, disposal plants, power plants, and like useful enterprises up to the erection and installation of complete up-to-minute water systems.

Exact segregation of waterworks projects from other P. W. A. projects is difficult, but the Bureau of Economics and Statistics of P. W. A. estimates as a basis of calculation that 1,696 allotments, totaling $169,631,820, were made for the construction of strictly related waterworks projects, this figure including both loans and grants. It is estimated by P. W. A.'s engineering division that the total amount of construction thus made possible, including the share furnished by the community's financing efforts, reached the sum of $247,000,000.

Exhibit "A", attached, covers allotments by States for waterworks and immediately related projects.

COMMUNITIES SPRING TO LIFE

This P. W. A. outlay of public investment in waterworks improvements and other worth-while activities in the first place remedied a most lamentable condition. In the latter twenties and the early thirties forward-thinking mayors, councilmen, and civic leaders were stopped cold by the inescapable fact that private capital was unwilling to invest in non-Federal governmental projects, hence no waterworks improvements. Communities attracted by the promise of 30-percent grant under the original program and 45-percent grant under the subsequent one entered 22,000 applications without pressure entirely of their own volition for all types of non-Federal projects, including not only waterworks but sewers, schools, auditoriums, courthouses, city halls, swimming pools, power plants, and so on. A total of $7,425,000,000 in loans and grants was asked. Of this number, 8,000 were accepted, representing $607,386,000 in Federal grants, and $1,333,663,000 either through private or P. W. A. financing, thus making a total of $1,941,650,000. Of these 8,000 approved applications, approximately one-fourth, or 2,000, were related to waterworks operations for a total outlay, including both P. W. A. and private financing, of an estimated $300,000,000.

COMMUNITY HEALTH SAFEGUARDED

This P. W. A. outlay of public investment in waterworks improvement in the second place aided in insuring communities against repetitions of the experience of an Ohio city in 1920 when 25 citizens died and 86 others suffered the tortures of typhoid fever before it was discovered seepage from a sewer pipe flowed into drinking water through an ancient defective section of a gravity main. Another illustration of the danger of neglect was found in a little town in South Dakota when a chlorination plant, after not being inspected for 5 years, failed to function and a number of citizens became ill and some died. Numerous other illustrations might be cited.

EMPLOYMENT FURNISHED ON SOUND BASIS

This P. W. A. outlay of public investment in waterworks improvement, as well as in other departments of its program, in the third place, adhered closely to the beforementioned double major objective:

First. To put men to work in local communities.

Second. To furnish maximum reemployment possible within the heavy industries.

The construction program was of great advantage because it made possible work for contractors and their supervisory staffs. It permitted the utilization of construction equipment which would otherwise have continued idle, with losses to the owners due to depreciation and carrying charges. It also furnished work for manufacturers of equipment and supplies; and it bolstered activity in the engineering and architectural professions.

It was written in ordinary agreements between P. W. A. and the community that 90 percent of the labor should be done by the unemployed from the relief rolls within the jurisdiction of the applicant except by special exemption.

In this manner 496,483 men, on an average, were given employment on P. W. A. sites during 1934 and 284,297 during 1935, a total of 10,707,311 man-months to the end of January 1935, including waterworks and all other types of P. W. A. construction. To these workers went $852,324,699 in wages.

For every dollar spent on the site, however, P. W. A. statisticians estimate that approximately $2.20 was spent "behind the lines." In other words, the work on the Federal project at Fort Peck Dam, in Montana, was done by workmen in that vicinity; but great quantities of heavy equipment were brought to the dam from distant points.

In cities such as Chicago and Pittsburgh, other additional workmen were added to the pay rolls to fabricate great scoops, shovels, concrete-dropping buckets, and similar equipment. Up to March 1, $1,240,229,337 was spent for materials and $129,916,127 for other purposes, the largest part of the first amount going into the pocket of the wage earner who either makes available the raw material or fabricates it. More than 60 percent of the Public Works money spent up to March 1 has gone for material manufacture. Exhibit B, attached, shows scope of materials in P. W. A. program.

Approximately $2,000,000,000 worth of stone, steel, cement, lumber, and hundreds of other types of building materials will be required to complete the 24,000 projects now on P. W. A. books. The 24,000 projects include the 8,000 non-Federal under discussion and an additional 15,000 or more Federal projects for which the P. W. A. allotted all the money. A total of $1,223,500,000 was spent for materials up to February 1. These expenditures were a major factor in reviving the heavy industries where unemployment was greater than anywhere else during the depression.

Reports from the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor as of the end of 1935, show that $581,629,000 worth of iron and steel products, including machinery and transportation equipment, have been purchased for improvements.

Industries furnishing cement, brick, stone, glass, sand, gravel, and similar materials for W. P. A. jobs had received orders amounting to $328,566,000, while more than $59,000,000 worth of lumber and forest products were purchased in that period.

The chemical industry, which embraces manufacture of explosives for blasting on P. W. A. jobs, has had orders for $9,714,000 worth of materials. Even the textile industry participated in the indirect employment benefits of the W. P. A. program, with orders for nearly $1,500,000.

Factories require lumber from the forests, coal and iron from the mines, and an endless number of other raw materials with which to manufacture the many hundreds of machines and instruments needed in the P. W. A. program.

INDIRECT EMPLOYMENT EXCEEDS DIRECT

Expenditures for materials used on P. W. A. construction sites have put more money into the pockets of hundreds of thousands of men employed in the mines, mills, and factories in every section of the country.

These reemployed workmen, both on and off site, with money jingling in their pockets for the first time in months, were able to resume their normal activities in their communities. They bought food, clothing, automobiles, and other necessities to the extent that they increased the demand for consumers' goods until an additional estimated 21,414,622 man-months of labor were furnished in factories producing and distributing this type of merchandise.

All in all, during 1934–35, 42,828,244 man-months of labor were created. Statisticians estimate that before the P. W. A. program is completed a total of 71,500,000 man-months of labor will have been created.

The term "man-months" may be confusing. It is a technical reference to the estimated amount of labor which will be furnished by the whole program. As an example, "on site" employment for the program will total 17,775,000 man-months.

If the whole program were to start tomorrow and to run simultaneously for 1 month, a total of workers at least equal to the site-employment total would be employed during the month in factories, at the mines, in the forests, or on the transporting railroads. Add the two figures and the number of so-called "secondary indirect" or "consumer goods" labor created can be approximated.

P. W. A.'s program, however, has not been confined to a single month nor a single year. The work has been steady. As of April 1, 71.25 percent of the program was completed, leaving 28.75 percent still under construction. This will continue to furnish wages until private industry upon its own account may absorb the unemployed.

Nor may the heavy industries say past expenditures have not helped. Industrial production for the whole United States during the 3-year period ending last December showed an increase of 56 percent. Steel-ingot production over that same period showed an increase of 265 percent. Automobile production increased 110 percent. Construction contracts increased 226 percent; the volume of check payments increased 33 percent. The bases for these calculations are statistics furnished by the Federal Reserve.

WATERWORKS PROGRAM HELPED RECOVERY

For those reasons it is easy to understand that the waterworks engineering industry, even while benefiting greatly from the P. W. A. program, did its share in the recovery. It is of no small moment that 25 percent or more of all the 8,000 non-Federal projects were of benefit to the industry.

In all this vast operation P. W. A. lent Federal funds only on unquestioned security. Legally permitted to sell bonds covering these loans P. W. A. has been doing so at a profit, the present total being in excess of $7,000,000. In one instance the bankers who had originally turned down the bond issue were the buyers. Money and profit go into a revolving fund from which P. W. A. may purchase additional municipal bonds.

In all this vast operation P. W. A. exerted the strictest supervision to guarantee that not a cent went amiss, that there can be no graft nor kick-backs in pay. It also aided the contractor in determining that the materials he purchased were of precisely the specified quality. The result of this minute supervision, especially where it pertained to the waterworks industry, was that it provided municipalities and other governmental agencies with improved local conditions as the newly built facilities became of lasting benefit.

P. W. A.'s funds have been exhausted. Administrator Harold L. Ickes has reported that there remained in April on P. W. A.'s files 6,204 additional applications asking $890,044,000 in grants and $1,044,709,000 in loans. These loans and grants totaling $1,934,754,000 would make possible construction estimated to cost a total of $2,347,690,000.

ADDRESS OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL

Mr. SMITH of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address by Postmaster General Farley at the State postmasters' convention held in West Virginia last Wednesday.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is Mr. Farley going to continue to be Postmaster General until after the next election and also continue as chairman of the Democratic National Committee? [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address delivered by Hon. James A. Farley, Postmaster General, at the annual convention of the West Virginia Chapter of the National Association of Postmasters in the Daniel Boone Hotel, Charleston, W. Va., April 22, 1936:

I am indebted to you postmasters of West Virginia for having this opportunity to meet with you in your annual convention, and I am honored by being asked to convey to you the greetings and best wishes of the President of the United States, who maintains an active interest in the Postal Service. I derive a special pleasure from meeting with those engaged in the work of the Postal Service, and whenever possible I accept invitations to meetings like this.

West Virginia is the only State in the Union which I have not heretofore visited. I have received a number of previous invitations to attend postal and other gatherings in this State, but unfortunately, these gatherings occurred at times when I had previous engagements or I was not in position to leave my duties at the Department in Washington.

Therefore I am happy that I have been able to come to Charleston, which is one of the most substantial cities in this country, and one which has shown a remarkable and consistent growth. I note from reports of the Census Bureau that the population of this city has grown from 22,996 in 1910 to 60,406 in 1930, and, I am informed, that since 1930 the population has maintained its percentage of increase.

An examination of the records of postal receipts at Charleston shows that in 1910 they amounted to $115,578 and that in 1935 they were $617,731. These figures provide indisputable evidence of the splendid progress of this city. In this State the postal revenues for March 1936, were 7 percent above those for the same month last year.

Conventions like this of the men and women who perform important functions in the operation of our Postal Service are of great value. They bring out new ideas; they give to the Department a better knowledge of the needs of the Service, and those participating learn more of the plans of the Post Office Department and its responsibilities to the public.

We can now look back over 3 years of successful postal administration. I can say with pardonable pride that we have demonstrated that a Government organization, which is the greatest public utility in the world, can be conducted in a businesslike manner with due regard to the public interest and to the employee's welfare and without waste or extravagance.

It costs approximately $700,000,000 a year to operate the Postal Service, and approximately $4,000 is paid into our post offices each minute of every business day by thousands who use these facilities. Last year we handled over 22,000,000,000 pieces of mail matter.

It is interesting to note that because of improper addresses and other mistakes on the part of the public more than 400 pieces of this vast amount of mail go to the dead-letter office ever 5 minutes of every business day. We handle approximately 214,000,000 money orders and 55,000,000 registered articles a year.

Postmasters have contributed in no small degree to improvements in the Postal Service. Their alertness and their sense of responsibility have been an important factor in earning the good will of the public which the Department enjoys.

The last annual convention of the National Association of Postmasters was held in Chicago in September. I was given the privilege of addressing this convention, and in my address I sought to outline the policies of the Department and some of the things accomplished under these policies. I want to repeat to you a few paragraphs from that address:

"When I was given charge of the Post Office Department I firmly resolved that its affairs would be handled in a businesslike manner; that the public would be promptly and efficiently served; that the employees would receive fair treatment, and that, insofar as it was possible of accomplishment, the Department would live within its income. Thanks to the loyal cooperation and assistance of my official staff in Washington and the faithfulness of the postmasters and postal employees, I am pleased to report that much has been accomplished in the improvement of service and in the betterment of conditions of the personnel.

"At the outset we were confronted with a diminishing mail volume, decreasing postal revenues, and an excess of personnel such as had never before existed in the history of the Department. Surveys were made which resulted in the discovery of the amazing condition that there were approximately 15,000 more people on the rolls of the Department than were needed. Something had to be done about it. Obviously but two courses were open for me to follow. One was the easy way of arbitrarily dropping from the Service those last appointed, thereby depriving them of a means of livelihood for themselves and their families. Such action, if taken, would have been entirely within the law and in accordance with practices that had been followed in the Post Office and in other departments in the past. The other course, which I adopted, was to spread employment during the emergency by means of furloughs and by retiring those who had grown old in the service, whose efficiency was impaired, and who had earned the right to an annuity. I have had no occasion to regret the decision made to follow the more humane course, and I am confident that all postmasters and all postal employees were glad to do their part.

"Early in 1934 there began a decided upturn in the business of the Department, and therefore furloughs were discontinued, salaries were restored, and additional benefits were provided for the workers in the Postal Service. When it seemed proper to do so, and in keeping with policies of efficient management, I recommended to the Congress, and secured approval for, the restoration of administrative and automatic promotions. A generous policy has been followed in granting such promotions. This has caused an additional expenditure of several millions of dollars, and it is worth it. Following this same general principle, and in keeping with the objectives of the President in spreading employment, on July 3, 1935, I gave my approval to the 40-hour-week bill, which is but one of the many progressive accomplishments of the Roosevelt administration.

"This measure was approved just as soon as I was satisfied that the increase in postal revenues was sufficient to care for all reasonable service requirements. In the administration of this new law it is my wish that the postmasters and supervisory officials in the field service exercise careful supervision. I want no waste of public money, and, above all, I want no impairment of existing postal service.

"I do feel, however, that those of you who are charged with the responsibility of managing the post offices will find it possible, to a large extent, to grant the employees what was obviously intended by the law—a 5-day week. Efficient service must be continued, and, of course, we are not going to close the post offices on Saturday or any other weekday, but I do want to urge you to do everything you can properly do to give the employees the full benefit of the shorter workweek."

The 40-hour law has largely solved what was a very acute substitute problem. Before its passage we had a great number of substitutes who had for years waited in vain for a regular job. These substitutes have in most instances obtained regular jobs, and regular positions have been provided for many others who were unemployed.

I was greatly concerned over the plight in which I found the substitutes when I became Postmaster General. Very few of them were obtaining sufficient employment to meet bare living expenses for themselves and their families, and yet they continued loyal to the service. I have heretofore expressed my appreciation for their loyalty in the face of distressing conditions, and I here take occasion to reiterate my appreciation. Nothing has given me more happiness and satisfaction than the relief which has come to these faithful employees.

That the Post Office Department is conducted efficiently is evidenced by the fact that during the recent tornadoes and floods business was carried on without serious interruption, except in a very few instances and then only for a brief time.

The confidence of the people in the Postal Service was indicated by the fact that more than 700 special-delivery letters were delivered to the people of Johnstown, Pa., and more than 85 bags of mail were collected from street letter boxes immediately after the flood waters in that city had receded.

The public has learned to know that the mails will go through and that the service will not fail them in times of stress and trouble.

Under acts of Congress the Post Office Department performs many services which are not of a postal nature and many services for which it receives no pay or only nominal pay: It is required to administer the subsidies for the maintenance of an American merchant marine and for the promotion of American aviation; it carries without charge reading matter for the blind and the mail of Congressmen and Senators, as well as of all Government departments. Quarters are provided in post-office buildings for other Government departments for which the Post Office Department receives no pay. Preferential rates are given newspapers and many are carried free within the county of publication.

The Post Office Department conducts the largest noncompetitive banking institution in this country—the Postal Savings System, which has nearly 2,600,000 depositors with approximately $1,214,000,000 on deposit at 8,111 post offices, including stations. This is the largest amount on deposit in the history of the System. These funds are redeposited with qualified banks or invested in United States bonds in accordance with the Postal Savings Act.

Under an amendment to the second Liberty Bond Act, approved February 4, 1935, the Post Office Department on March 1, 1935, placed on sale United States savings bonds at all Presidential post offices and a few selected fourth-class post offices—more than 14,000 in all. Since that day 800 additional fourth-class offices have been designated to sell such bonds. These bonds, popularly known as "baby bonds", were designed for the small investor. Since March 1, 1935, the Department has sold nearly 1,300,000 United States savings bonds, with a total face value of more than $400,000,000.

The Department is now actively engaged in making the necessary arrangements for the payment of veterans' adjusted-service bonds, which may be surrendered for payment at all post offices, beginning on June 15.

Business throughout the country is steadily improving. Even a casual reading of the daily newspapers reveals that fact and the increasing volume of postal receipts confirms it.

Because of their intimate relationship to the interests of the people, postal receipts are very sensitive to changing business conditions. For that reason the volume of matter coming into the mails, as shown by postal receipts, has long been regarded as a most reliable indication of general business conditions. Postal receipts of all kinds at 50 representative post offices, including the very largest offices, were approximately $28,900,000 for the month of March 1936, as compared with approximately $27,000,313 for the same month of 1935, an increase of 5.59 percent; at 50 other post offices located in industrial regions, the increase was 8.83 percent

This upward swing in business conditions is also reflected in the increased mailings of newspapers and other publications. The total weight for the quarter ending December 31, 1935, was nearly 302,800,000 pounds, as compared with nearly 280,000,000 pounds for the same quarter in 1934, an increase of 8.13 percent.

The most convincing evidence that business concerns are experiencing a decided improvement is the marked increase in the volume of advertising carried in newspapers and periodicals mailed as second-class matter, there being nearly 92,000,000 pounds for the December 1935 quarter as against nearly 83,000,000 pounds for the same period of the previous year. The increase for the December 1935 quarter over the same period of the previous year was nearly 11 percent.

Postal revenues for the 8 months of this fiscal year—from July 1 to February 29, 1936—amounted to approximately $27,000,000 more than the same period of last year. This is an increase of more than 6 percent.

While postal receipts are one of the best barometers of business conditions, we have plenty of additional evidence. This additional evidence is found in increased bank deposits, increased car loadings, increased capitalization of industries, increased earnings, higher dividends and better commodity prices. This trend, which began more than 2 years ago, is, in my opinion, certain to continue and with an accelerated pace.

Under the present administration several hundred new post-office buildings have been erected. These buildings have been apportioned to the various States and congressional districts. The Post Office Department is working with the Treasury Department in the carrying out of public-building projects provided under allotments by the Public Works Administration and by congressional authorization.

The act of June 19, 1934, authorized the expenditure of $65,000,000 for public-building construction at places to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General. Three hundred and sixty-one projects were selected for consideration under this authorization. At present 59 of these projects have been completed and 224 have been placed under contract and are now in course of construction. In 13 cases bids have been opened or have been invited. In the remaining cases under the $65,000,000 program, comprising less than 20 percent of the total in number, plans are well under way and it is believed that it will be possible to ask for construction bids in the immediate future.

Under the act of August 12, 1935, 354 building projects were set up. This program has progressed to the extent that it is expected 90 percent of the projects will be under contract within the next few weeks. Already sites have been selected in 286 of the cases where the acquisition of land was necessary. Contracts have been awarded in 15 cases and in practically all of the remaining cases plans are nearing completion.

During the past 2½ years all of our mail transportation services have been surveyed and to a large extent reorganized. Included in these transportation services are railway mail, ocean mail, domestic air mail, foreign air mail, rural mail, and star routes. In the Railway Mail Service much excess car space has been eliminated.

The domestic air-mail system has been entirely reconstructed and is the most efficient air-mail service in the world. More miles are flown daily on regular schedules and more cities are served than at any time since the domestic air-mail system was established. The schedules are faster, the equipment the latest and best and the cost for this vastly improved service is much less than the cost for the previous inferior service.

Our foreign air-mail system has been revised and rearranged, providing for better equipment, faster schedules, and reduced costs. Last October we let a contract for trans-Pacific service between the United States and China. It is our expectation that within the next year or two we will have a trans-Atlantic service between the United States and Europe. Our foreign air-mail system, like our domestic air-mail service, is the finest and most extensive in the world. These foreign routes encircle both South and Central America, serving the various countries in both. It also embraces routes to Cuba, to Mexico, and to Canada. Modern air-mail service has been provided among the islands of the Hawaiian group, and improvements have been made in the Alaskan air-mail service, with further expansion of these services in the territory planned.

The Department is now engaged in effecting economies and improvements in the ocean-mail service and much has been accomplished in improving the rural mail service and effecting a substantial saving in its operation.

Whatever success has been achieved in providing a better postal service for the people of our country is mainly due to the earnest efforts and loyalty of those who make up our great organization, and in conclusion I wish to thank you and the other postmasters of the United States and all postal employees for the fine contributions you and they have made to the service.

THE WAGNER-ELLENBOGEN BILL FOR LOW-RENT HOUSING AND SLUM CLEARANCE IS NEEDED TO ASSURE FURTHER SUBSTANTIAL RECOVERY

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that our colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLENBOGEN] may have the right to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, about five and one-half million people have been reemployed in the United States since March 1933, but about ten million people are still unemployed. How does that come about and what can we do to reduce substantially the number of these jobless? These are questions that have been put to me many times during the last few months.

The consumer-goods industries—that is, goods bought for immediate use—have had a surprisingly extensive recovery. Even the heavy-goods industries have made substantial recovery and seem to be progressing rapidly. Steel, for instance, is now operating at between 65 and 70 percent of its theoretical capacity.

One industry is lagging behind—lagging behind so far that it cannot even be seen in the recovery parade. That industry is the building industry. If you keep in mind that this industry employs directly 1,000,000 people, and indirectly about three additional millions, a total of 4,000,000 people, you will find one of the answers to the question of why we still have 10,000,000 unemployed.

In 1927, according to the reliable statistical figures of the F. W. Dodge Co., the value of all construction contracts amounted to $6,603,000,000. In 1935 these construction contracts amounted to only $1,845,000,000—a decrease of 71 percent. These figures tell the story.

There can be no further substantial recovery unless there is a revival of the construction industry; and there can be no revival of the building industry unless we engage upon a large-scale program of the construction of homes. A program sponsored by the Federal Government to stimulate the construction of low-cost housing, and to increase home-building activities, is therefore not only socially desirable but economically imperative if we are to have further recovery.

THERE IS AN ACUTE SHORTAGE OF DECENT HOUSES

There is today an acute shortage of decent houses. Those of you who have been looking for a house during this moving season have had personal experience. You have acquired a personal knowledge of the scarcity of desirable houses at a rental in fair proportion to your income. This is especially true of families with low incomes, where the largest share of the annual income must go for food, for clothing, and for the other necessities of life. Families of moderate income have little left with which to meet the high rentals which are demanded for decent, sanitary homes.

Adequate, decent housing—safe and sanitary homes—are a fundamental need of our people. The problem of housing has been neglected too long. The people cry out for decent and sanitary homes. Further recovery demands a revival and stabilization of the building industry at a higher level.

The Wagner-Ellenbogen housing bill is the solution of that problem; it is the bill that will meet the demands of families of low incomes. This bill has been introduced in the Senate by Senator WAGNER, of New York, and in the House of Representatives by me.

FIVE MILLION FAMILIES HAVE DOUBLED UP

Several millions of new homes are needed immediately to provide only a minimum of decency and privacy for American families. At least 5,000,000 families have doubled up since the depression started. Vacancies are few and are utterly insufficient to meet the demand. An acute housing shortage is rapidly developing.

BUILDING-TRADES WORKERS ARE AVAILABLE TO CONSTRUCT THE NEEDED HOMES

And here is the tragedy of it all: Millions of decent homes are needed. The building-trades workers who would build them are available, but they live, or rather exist, in enforced idleness. Carpenters, bricklayers, electricians, mechanics, and other skilled workers look for jobs in vain.

Four million people depend directly or indirectly on the building industry. Plants supplying materials are idle; warehouses and lumber yards are bulging with needed materials. Millions of families live in slums or blighted areas, but nothing is done, nothing is done to give employment, to give construction activities and to provide safe and sanitary homes that are greatly needed.

The Wagner-Ellenbogen housing bill is designed to supply the spark that will launch a gigantic construction program.

UNSANITARY HOMES ABOUND IN PITTSBURGH DISTRICT

The Bureau of Business Research of the University of Pittsburgh made a careful survey recently and found these astounding facts about housing in Pittsburgh.

First. There are more than three times as many families "doubled up" as there are vacant dwellings.

Second. One out of every four homes in Pittsburgh has no running hot water.

Third. One out of every four homes has no bath.

Fourth. One-half of all the homes in Pittsburgh have no proper heating facilities.

Fifth. One out of every eight has no indoor toilet facilities.

This survey was made before the flood.

More than 10,000 homes in Allegheny County have been destroyed by the flood or have been rendered uninhabitable by it.

THE TERRIBLE COST OF SLUM AREAS

If you go into the slums of New York, Chicago, Cleveland, Pittsburgh, and other large cities in the United States, you will be appalled by the sordid conditions of squalor and poverty. These slums are breeders of crime and disease and a tremendous expense and burden to every municipality that tolerates them. Here is just one example:

It costs Chicago $3,200,000 a year to supply such municipal services as police and fire protection, street lighting, sewerage facilities, and so forth, but it receives only $300,000 in taxes from the same slum area. That means that the tax revenue is only one-sixth of the actual cost of the municipal services rendered. It means that it costs the city of Chicago $2,900,000 to maintain this particular slum area.

Slums are not only a shame and disgrace in a Nation as wealthy as the United States but they are an economic burden and an impediment to social progress. The United States is the wealthiest nation in the world. We are rich not only in natural resources but we have the best human material available on the globe. Our people are intelligent, inventive, and enterprising. There is no legitimate reason why we should not have adequate and decent housing for everyone. Poverty-stricken Europe has built at least 7,000,000 new homes with government aid, whereas the wealthy United States has hardly scratched the surface.

HOUSING ACTIVITIES REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT

Moreover, many economists claim that the public housing activities in Europe have been the most important single factor in fighting unemployment over there. Why cannot we do the same here?

Just to give you a few more figures at this time—590,000 building-trades workers whose occupation is direct employment on the construction site are unemployed. Of those, 232,000 are on relief. It costs us $167,000,000 to maintain those on relief every year and many, many more millions to maintain those not on relief. Would it not be better, would it not be wiser, would it not be more sensible, to spend these $167,000,000 for the construction of homes for families of low income? Would it not be better to give employment to the workers in this manner and to build decent homes? Of course it would.

NEED FOR PASSAGE OF THE WAGNER-ELLENBOGEN BILL

I hope that this Congress will pass the Wagner-Ellenbogen housing bill. There is not one single, honest, or valid objection that could be maintained against it. It will give employment to large numbers of jobless. It will provide the necessary push for further and perhaps complete recovery. It will aid in the clearance of slums and the elimination of crime and disease. It will establish a cleaner and more healthy atmosphere for the mothers of America to watch over their children. It will give to the children of America the opportunity to grow to a happier, a healthier, and more promising maturity.

PRICE CONTROL BILLS

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address I made as part of a radio debate with Senator LOGAN, of Kentucky, over station WOR, Mutual broadcasting chain, Sunday, April 26, 1936, as follows:

I am going to address you tonight as consumers, for it is as consumers that you are primarily interested in the Patman price-control bills. For if these bills get by the Congress they are going to affect prices, and therefore your pocketbooks. You—the consumers—beware.

Some decades ago Commodore Vanderbilt coined the phrase, "the public be damned." The authors and sponsors of the so-called Robinson-Patman price-discrimination bills or price-control bills say, in effect, the consumer be damned. Otherwise they would not levy upon you, the consumer, a hidden tax under the guise of equalizing opportunity among storekeepers and wholesalers.

There should be, as a matter of fact, a Federal department to look after your interests, a department of the consumer, just as there is a Department of Labor and of Commerce and of Agriculture, but until there is one your only recourse is to write your Congressman and your Senators. That you should do at once in connection with these Robinson-Patman bills. There are two, one before the Senate and one reported to the House—one is worse in some ways, the other in others—but both are bad enough when it comes to your interests, as you can imagine when I tell you one was written by a lawyer for a group of wholesalers and the other is merely a recasting of his handiwork—he wrote the bills before N. R. A. went out, to replace the grocery price-control code in case N. R. A. ever folded up. So I will just call them both the Robinson-Patman bill and refer to the House or Senate version when necessary.

Let's see how this bill, which really should be christened "the code-replacing bill", goes about prying into your pocketbooks. First of all, without giving you any representation in the matter or protecting labor through hour and wage provisions, it repeats some of the more vicious features of the N. R. A. which the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional. It seeks to revive price fixing, which was the keystone of most of the N. R. A. codes, by practically prohibiting price differentials except under very rigid restrictions and limitations. It would prevent economically sound "quantity discounts" on large purchases. It would establish arbitrary classifications of buyers instead of classifications based upon efficiency and economy in serving you. It would, in a word, throttle competition. Senator LOGAN and his followers disclaim these effects, but their denials are as ineffectual as snow falling upon an iceberg, for the official record proves to the contrary.

President Roosevelt has not sponsored this measure. It is not, therefore, an administration bill. The President, moreover, in a public statement recently said that "the recovery program recognizes and accepts the principle that continued prosperity is contingent to a large degree on increased efficiency in moving the essentials of life from the producer to the consumer * * *. Great progress * * * has been made in the field of production. Our distribution facilities have lagged behind production * * *." The bill under discussion flies in the face of the principles enunciated by our President because it would lay an axe at the tree of efficiency in the movement of essentials of life from the producers to you, the consumers. It would make more expensive and difficult the moving of goods from the mill, mine, and farm to the consumer, and thus cause our distributive facilities to lag further behind production, and thereby frustrate the desire of our President for a more abundant life for all of us. The inevitable consequences of this bill would be higher prices and lower standards of living. And that means you would have less than you have today.

This Patman bill as framed in the House will place a Damoclean sword over the heads of industry and business. For under it the Federal Trade Commission is made the tyrant over industry, a price-fixing tyranny, and in the end you pay the costs of the tyranny. It is clothed with plenary powers, e. g., to issue orders fixing "quantity discounts", with practically the unrestrained right to fix price differentials. Isn't that price fixing? I, therefore, must disagree with Senator LOGAN. He probably has in mind the Senate bill, which is a milder bill. I refer to the House bill which is price fixing with a vengeance. The Commission can fix a ceiling as high or as low as it wishes, beyond which discounts cannot be made regardless of the quantity of goods sold. Of course, its decrees can be reviewed by the courts. But what of the expense! First the seller is yanked down to Washington, mayhap upon the complaint of a jealous competitor. Then there is the luxury of a costly court review. The proponents of this version of the bill say it will help the small manufacturers. How many small dealers and producers can withstand the expense of such litigation? And mind you, there will be a continuous procession of traders compelled to explain and answer charges, because there will be eavesdroppers and malcontents all over the country anxious and willing to embarrass their competitors.

One of the most potent arguments against the N. R. A. was the harassment of small-business men in answering complainants. And always in the end you, the consumer, pay the freight in higher prices.

Incidentally, all findings of fact of the Federal Trade Commission are conclusive even on the court. Furthermore, when you are accused before the Commission under the House version of the bill, you must prove your innocence. Even the meanest criminal is deemed innocent until proven guilty. The burden of proof is always on the accuser.

Not so in these proceedings before the Federal Trade Commission. By some hocus-pocus reasoning the accused must exculpate himself. He must prove his innocence. The burden is on him.

The Federal Trade Commission would under this version of the bill become the greatest bureaucracy of the century. There are 2,000,000 names in Dun & Bradstreet's register. Conservatively, there are 500,000 different kinds of articles of commerce. Multiply the 2,000,000 merchants and manufacturers and businessmen by the thousands of different types of commodities and you will have some idea of the myriads of potential controversies that will come before the Commission—not once a year but dozens of times, on different quantities, and under varying conditions. It is estimated that the Commission would be compelled to employ thousands of experts. And who would foot that pay roll? Why, of course, you, the consumer!

Let us take a page from the experience of Henry Ford and see what he would say concerning a bill of this character, which limits competition and seeks to place business across a procrustean bed of regulation:

"The competition of quality and service is the only thought worthy of the name. When government enters largely into industry or distribution, or into any of the elements which go to make up our lives, competition is replaced by regulation. * * * Since regulation must bar competition and directly or indirectly fix prices, everything that is obsolete will be preserved and nothing that means progress will be allowed."

"Quality discounts" may sound technical and unrelated to you, but each one means money saved to you, and therefore any restrictions of them mean higher prices to you for whatever is involved. So you and your pocketbook are concerned with them.

My good friend, the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], says the bill does not interfere with economically sound "quantity discounts." I fear Senator LOGAN is deceived by the tricky wording of section 2 of the House bill, which precludes discounts unless there is a difference in cost resulting from a differing method of manufacture.

Suppose I have about made up my mind to buy a thousand pairs of shoes from you, a manufacturer. You have made out my order. I suddenly decide to take 10,000 pairs of shoes if you will give me a "quantity discount." Can you give me that discount? No, unless you want to run the risk of violating the Robinson-Patman bill. Why? Because you only have to add a cipher to the original order of 1,000 pairs in your order book, and the cost to you of selling me the 10,000 pairs is just the same as if you sold me only 1,000 pairs of shoes. There is no differing method involved; and as limited by those trick words in section 2 you can only give me a price differential if there is a cost of sale differential resulting from a differing method. There is no difference in the cost of sale of either the 1,000 or the 10,000, hence no discount.

Now, when prices are driven up as the result of such arbitrary regulation, you as consumers foot the added expense.

It is interesting to recall a recent Supreme Court decision in the Sugar Institute case. The members of the institute banded together for the purpose of refusing to grant quantity discounts on large purchases of sugar. They did exactly what these Patman-Robinson bills require. Did the Supreme Court let them get away with this? Emphatically, no! The Supreme Court said that the refiners were menacing trade in general by refusing to grant these quantity discounts. In other words, the Supreme Court in effect held that the sugar manufacturers must do exactly what the Robinson-Patman bills forbid. It wished to protect the consumer, because through quantity discounts prices are lowered.

Now, what you are probably most interested in knowing about this code-replacing bill is just how it will raise prices on you, since its sponsors say it will not raise prices, for they well know a bill they admitted would raise prices would not get far. Mr. PATMAN even goes further, you know, and says it will reduce prices.

Let's amuse ourselves for a minute seeing how he figures that out. First, he says the bill forces manufacturers to sell small orders at the same price as larger orders.

So far, so good. It would do that, for a fact.

Next, Mr. PATMAN says that as a result of all prices being the same, small buyers, who buy as a total three times as much as large buyers, but in small quantities, will get lower prices than the 25 percent who place the fewer large orders.

Presto! says Mr. PATMAN at this point, and seriously contends that if the large-lot buyers save you consumers $750,000,000 a year, then under his Robinson-Patman bill exactly three times that will be made in savings for you, and so, as a mere matter of arithmetic, you will save two and a quarter billions, or three times $750,000,000!

Now, honestly, that sort of figuring, you will all admit, puts Dr. Townsend to shame.

Of course, you have already seen the catch in his sleight-of-hand arithmetic.

That catch is simply that all stores do not cost the same to run, all storekeepers are not of equal ability, and not all stores have an equal volume of business.

No law can make all men of equal ability, make all stores of equal size, or make all locations equal to important corners.

Now, just how do these simple facts make Mr. PATMAN's figuring look ridiculous? They make it look really more than ridiculous because the goods we have just imagined as leaving the factory at the same price to all buyers, regardless of quantity bought, would, of course, have to go to you consumers 75 percent through nearly 1,400,000 stores of various sizes, paying various costs, and run by men of varying ability, and located in various types of communities—and always first of all through middlemen's hands.

Now, 62 percent of these 1,400,000 stores sell only $10,000 or less a year. Twenty-five percent of those in the grocery field sell only $4,500 a year or less.

A store selling only $10,000 a year pays about 15 percent of its sales for expenses and about 20 percent of its sales to the proprietor for his draw, if that draw came to only $40 a week, which is certainly small enough, yet more than he usually gets by a good deal. And first the wholesaler has gotten his 10 percent or 15 percent. And there are other items. So the total you pay is around 50 percent of these stores' retail prices, if the owner is getting only a modest living, which he doesn't get in most cases. If a store sells only $5,000 a year, and the proprietor draws only a pittance of $10 a week, the expense you, as a consumer, must pay is about that same 50 cents out of every dollar you spend, including the wholesalers' "take" and the other items.

So you see that the lower price at which 75 percent of the goods would supposedly go out of the factories to these 1,400,000 individual stores, under Mr. PATMAN's plan of the same price to all, would never reach you, the consumer. What the middlemen did not absorb would, of course, be absorbed in increasing the "draws" of those store proprietors a little—a few dollars a week toward getting them up to even $35 or $40 a week; and certainly they would even then be small enough, as nobody can deny. The point is that you, as a consumer, would certainly never stand the slightest chance of ever receiving any of these lowerings in price, even if a leveling off of prices at factories could be legislated in order to bring them about.

Now, let's look at what would happen to the 25 percent of the items you buy which are going to you through mass distribution, direct from producer to you, without any payment to middlemen, and at a resultant saving to you, as Mr. PATMAN admits, of hundreds of millions. These 140,000 stores run at about half the cost of the multi-middleman system which serves the 1,400,000 other stores.

Under Mr. PATMAN's equal-price-for-all-quantities plan this 25 percent of the factories' sales would cost more, certainly 10 or 15 percent more, exactly as it is assumed the 75 percent we have just discussed would cost less because of the supposed leveling of prices at factories. And you would therefore have to pay 10 or 15 percent more than you pay now for these items at these 140,000 stores operating under mass distribution. And 15 percent on what you buy in these 140,000 economical ways would total up to just about a billion dollars a year for all of you 127,000,000 consumers. There's your bill—$1,000,000,000!

And that is why these Robinson-Patman equality-for-all bills would cost you, the consumers, a billion dollars if they worked as their friends hope they would. And that is why I am against them.

And would the little dealers really get that billion? They would not. If they would, I might be for these bills even if they did hurt you consumers, for these merchants could certainly use the money, and they are consumers like the rest of us.

They would not get the billion because what was left, after the tens of thousands of middlemen they owe money to had gotten theirs, would be quickly lost through trade you consumers would, out of self-protection, have to shift away from them and give to their 140,000 competitors still offering the lowest prices; just as soon as those price increases hit you on the 25 percent of the orders that had to go out from factories at higher prices under Mr. PATMAN's leveling process. Isn't that so? Of course it is. It stands to reason that the 140,000 mass-distribution outlets, since they run at half the cost of the multimiddleman system, would be still offering the lowest prices despite the price increases forced on them; and it also stands to reason that the higher prices would force you to buy more from them in order to keep your heads above water. Of course, if you happened to be buying everything from them, you surely would be out of luck!

So, you see, it is just common sense that the pretty picture painted in support of these Robinson-Patman bills won't come true, can't come true. We can't by law, much as we'd like to, make unequals equal. And since they would prove a snare and delusion to the small dealer, who has been misled by the wholesalers and others into thinking they would really help him, and a pain in the pocketbook to you consumers, I am dead against them.

The Supreme Court knows that when competition is throttled prices rise, and that when prices rise you as consumers pay the piper. Now, the sponsor of this bill, Mr. PATMAN, at least tacitly admits that his bill will have the effect of discouraging reduction in prices, because, he said:

"If the Robinson-Patman bill is enacted into law, all merchants will receive the same prices from the manufacturers."

Now, when Mr. PATMAN says under his bill the manufacturers cannot sell to the larger retailers at prices less than those he accords to the smaller retailers, he must be right. Therefore, the larger retailers will be precluded from passing on to you, the consumers, the savings in reduced costs that they otherwise would obtain from the manufacturer.

Senator LOGAN, in the report on the Senate bill, says you, as consumers, will be willing to pay higher prices to guard yourselves from any remote possibility of monopoly developing in distribution. Would you? How much more would you like to pay out every week on that sort of proposition and to help some middlemen equalize opportunity? Why not let the good Senator know that you are unwilling to pay higher prices?

In effect, therefore, this bill would increase prices. If further proof is required, let us note what Dr. Harold G. Moulton, of the Brookings Institution, recently said:

"This bill, insofar as it would strike at all those who have heretofore been effective in reducing prices, to that extent, will raise prices."

To the same effect are the words of Prof. Malcolm P. McNair, of Harvard University:

"* * * With very few exceptions, the large-scale retail enterprises of today are fighting the consumer's battle. Their bargaining power is a wholesome weight in the balance against the monopolistic tendencies of many manufacturers. Congress certainly will not be serving the consumer's interest by tipping the balance of the scale further toward the manufacturers' side."

And Prof. M. C. Waltersdorf, head of the department of economics of Washington and Jefferson College, says:

"The proposed law would not facilitate increased distribution at lower cost, but no doubt would hinder the flow of goods. This is undesirable, as it would retard rather than facilitate recovery."

While Prof. Shaw Livermore, of the University of Buffalo, writes as follows:

"I am emphatically opposed to this bill and anything similar to it discriminating against the able and efficient retail distributors of the country. It will tend to destroy healthy competition and not to maintain it."

Herewith is a portion of a wire received from Prof. William A. Carter, of the department of economics, Dartmouth College:

"Opposed to legislative attempts to arbitrarily classify distributors. Proposed bill administratively unfeasible in regard to quantitative differentials. Prefer Federal Trade Commission Act to prevent price discrimination among buyers and sellers with respect to same grade, quality, and quantity goods."

In other words, Professor Carter is of the opinion that the scope of the present Federal Trade Commission is ample to take care of present evils.

Prof. H. L. Caverly, of the University of Michigan, says as follows:

"I do not approve of any attempts to restrict free competition as embodied in the bill."

Dr. George Filipetti, professor of economics at the University of Minnesota, says as follows:

"The Robinson-Patman bill runs counter to reductions of cost of production and distribution, places a premium of inefficiency, and would be likely to result in the exploitation of the ultimate users of articles of commerce and industry."

While Prof. C. C. Huntington, of Ohio State University, writes:

"I believe in lower prices for quantity sales, if such prices are still above the cost of producing, and filling such order is to the advantage of the consumer, and helps the purchasing power of the consumer in the lower income brackets."

In addition to the experts mentioned above, opposition to the bill is professed by Profs. Lewis H. Haney and Walter E. Spahr, of New York University, and Prof. T. R. Snavely, of the University of Virginia.

I could readily quote at length the names of scores of other well-known economists, selected at random from various parts of the country, who have expressed disapproval of the bill, primarily on the score of increased prices to you, the consumers.

Now you are interested in the bill as consumers from another angle. Increased prices mean fewer jobs; reduced prices, more jobs. This doctrine was recently clearly set forth by the Brookings Institution. It is splendidly illustrated by the automobile industry. The price of an automobile a decade ago was more than twice the average price of an automobile at the present time. The gradual reduction in price of the average car has placed the automobile within easy reach of you, the American consumer, resulting in a yearly progressive increase in the manufacture and sale of cars, with the consequent increase in employment in automobile factories and in garages, repair shops, accessory plants, service stations.

But if the price of automobiles had instead risen, what would have happened? Fewer, instead of more, cars would have been sold, and employment in the industry and its related trades would have decreased, instead of expanding as it has. Therefore, this bill, in the sense that it will increase prices, will to that extent decrease employment. President Roosevelt last night said that lower prices becomes one of the cornerstones of the New Deal. This bill, since it would increase prices, destroys one of the props of the Roosevelt New Deal.

Now let's take a look at this bugaboo of monopoly they say is about to jump out at you from every store. The proponents of the Robinson-Patman bill say its passage is necessary to prevent retail monopolies or tendencies thereto. In fact, their bill, which has been christened and rechristened by themselves several times, has as its most recent name the Patman-Robinson equal opportunity in business bill, evidently to give it an antimonopoly appeal. There is no monopoly in the retail field. There isn't even a leak in the dike, as Senator LOGAN fears. The big national mass distributors (all the talking is about) only do 8 percent of national distribution. The competitors agitating for this bill overlook carefully the fact that 87 percent (of this 8 percent) of the mass distributors have each only 25 stores or less and are sectional or intrastate business. You can't spell monopoly out of 8 percent no matter how hard you spell. And the Federal Trade Commission investigated 6 years at a cost to you consumers of $1,000,000 and could find no monopolistic practices in the retail field.

We've had an antitrust law since 1890, and it is important that you know how section 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act reads. It goes this way: "Every person who shall monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding 1 year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court."

Now you should have in mind this part of section 4: "The several courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of this act; and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations."

Now, just let me read to you from section 1 of an addition to the antitrust laws—the Federal Trade Commission Act, adopted September 26, 1914: "A Commission is hereby created and established, to be known as the Federal Trade Commission." And section 5 of that act reads in part: "That unfair methods of competition in commerce are hereby declared unlawful. The Commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent persons, partnerships, or corporations from using unfair methods of competition in commerce."

Then there follows a detailed procedure for the Commission to pursue in covering investigations, hearings, recording of testimony, and so on. After all this procedure has been gone through with, if, in the opinion of the Commission, the accused is guilty of unfair practice, the Commission issues what is technically called a cease-and-desist order. If this order is not obeyed the violator is turned over to the Federal circuit court of appeals and the judgment and decree of the court shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court.

Now, the point it is important for you to keep in mind is this: If Senator LOGAN or the other proponents of the Robinson-Patman bills seriously believe there are monopolies in existence or conditions tending to create monopolies or unfair trade practices which need correcting, let them report these complaints to the Federal attorneys or to the Attorney General of the United States or to the Federal Trade Commission. There are, as I have shown you, ample laws now in effect, and time after time in the last 45 years these laws have been upheld by the United States Supreme Court. So I say: Let the proponents of the Patman-Robinson bills do that, forthrightly and earnestly, rather than to try to write into our Federal Statutes a law at the behest of a reactionary group of wholesale grocers, a law which would curb competition for the consumer. Nobody objects to vigorous enforcement of existing laws, or even to new laws that specify predatory trade practices like false brokerage or false advertising allowances. What more could be asked?

No more could be fairly asked. But more is asked for, as I have shown. That "more" is price fixing and price rising for the benefit of groups which want price control privileges. Now that is a "more" that means more expenses to you, and if you don't want that, you had better get busy and make your opinion felt.

I have put you on warning. It's your move now—write your Congressmen and Senators.

THE REVENUE BILL OF 1936

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is action upon the bill (H. R. 12395) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON and Mr. SNELL demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 267, nays 93, answered "present" 1, not voting 66, as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—THE TAX BILL

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, I shall vote for this tax bill, not because I thoroughly understand it, for it is too long and complicated for a Yankee schoolmaster to know it all. I like it because of its opponents and also for its friends. I have lots of faith in the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of this House and its majority members, and I believe they have been eminently fair in the hearings on this bill which I have read carefully.

I have listened with much interest and pleasure to the debate—interest because it is of so much vital importance to the country, and I have felt also that I needed to pay much attention to this bill to try to learn what I could of this necessarily complicated and voluminous measure. I have heard it, as it seems to me, ably and understandingly, fairly and fully analyzed, opposed, and defended by its opponents and friends. And in passing I wish to say that I believe the Democratic Party and the Nation is fortunate to have backing this bill the chairman and majority members of the Ways and Means Committee and, in fact, in my opinion, the chairmen and majority members of the important committees of this House are a credit to any party anywhere at any time.

The opponents of this bill say, first, that it is unconstitutional; second, that it will not raise added revenue because it will hurt big business; and third, that it will aid the corporations and big business and will hurt the little fellow, which reminds me of the story of the lawyer who said: "Gentlemen of the jury, we shall attempt to prove, and shall prove, three things: (1) That my client never borrowed the kettle; (2) that when he borrowed it there was a hole in it; and (3) that when he returned it he returned it whole."

This pending bill has been so fully and ably discussed on both sides of the House that it would be presumptuous, indeed, for me to attempt to discuss it here. I wish, however, if I may, to review some features disclosed to me in the report of the hearings. First, unconstitutionality: If you folks think it is unconstitutional, why not let it ride and show us up later? Why are you trying in every way possible, by all the tricks of Philadelphia lawyers, to stop this bill if it is unconstitutional? Why are you wasting so much of your sweetness on the desert air? It seems to me that any fair-minded man who reads a report of the hearings and who has listened to the debates will see that testimony both for and against this bill has been received by the chairman and majority members in a spirit and an air of fair play, of a desire to get the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, from all angles; "brain trusters", both of the Farley and Fletcher type, and practical "hoss sense" stuff, administration agents and their critics, leaders in business of all kinds, private and corporate, and, last, but by no means least, lawyers representing generally the interests of chambers of commerce, of capital opposing the bill, but testifying that it will help big business and hurt the small—so in the mass taken together we have attorneys for the corporations testifying that it will help big business and hurt the little fellow. They seem to be very solicitous about the little fellow. It seems queer.

Then the largeness of the bill seems to trouble them a great deal, and the fact that it is not simple. And yet when Mr. Alvord was questioned he admitted that the tax laws written in the administration in which Mr. Mellon was Secretary of the Treasury and when he was the special assistant were not very simple.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I have many friends on the Republican side of this House. I feel very friendly to Republicans. I do not know why I should not; a good many of them voted for me at the last election. If they had not, I never would have been elected in the First Congressional District of Maine. If they do not vote for me in the coming election, I shall not come back here. So I am bound to have a warm feeling in my heart for them, and I want to reform them. The fact that so many of them are voting for me shows that I have a good chance to, and so I want to remind them, in the spirit of "the good neighbor", that since 1865 the tax laws of the United States have been passed for the benefit of the northeastern section of this country. We will agree that we have had prosperity, with many depressions, too; but we also assert that the tax laws have been written for the benefit largely of the wealthy class to make them wealthier. We do not need to tell of the increase of millionaires; everybody knows it who reads.

This bill is titled "A bill to provide a revenue and to equalize taxation." I do not know whether it will get a revenue or not. I do not know whether it will equalize taxation or not, but I do believe that it was framed largely for those two purposes, especially the latter. You folks, we all know, on this side, my left, you good friends of mine, and good men, stand on the whole for the vested interests of this country. We know just as well that on the whole and with a very few exceptions, and we found those exceptions last year largely when we passed the utility and holding-company bill, this side, my right, with its great leader is trying to work for the common class of America.

I am voting for this bill which I believe to be a bill constructed for this purpose, written not in secret, debated fully and fairly by some of the ablest and fairest men in this Nation, and I believe that it will prove to this country that the Democratic Party not only has the inclination but the ability to write this great tax bill which will prove an excellent piece of legislation for the Nation we love.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, on March 3 the President sent to Congress a message suggesting the imposition of new taxes and outlining a scheme of taxation to meet permanent annual revenue requirements, the principal feature of which is a tax on undistributed corporate income. On this point he said:

> Such a revision of our corporate taxes would effect great simplification in tax procedure—

And so forth.

The bill now under consideration is the answer to the President's suggestion for a simplification of our tax law; a bill 249 pages in length, so simple in its verbiage that it seems as though nobody understands it. In its simplicity it presents one of the most complex tax proposals ever offered to the Congress or the taxpayers.

Even the Secretary of the Treasury dodged the responsibility of appearing before the Ways and Means Committee to advocate or defend the President's proposals for this new tax program. I have taken part in the framing of a number of tax bills since I have been a member of the Ways and Means Committee, but it is the first time in my recollection when the responsible head of the Treasury Department did not come before the committee to give us the benefit of his judgment and advice on proposed revenue legislation.

In this particular instance the Treasury Department was represented by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and one of its statisticians. Later on, at the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], ranking minority member of the committee, Mr. Oliphant, General Counsel of the Treasury Department, and Mr. Kent, Chief Counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, appeared before the committee.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, of course, has nothing to do with the revenues of the Government excepting to collect them. He is charged with the responsibility of carrying out the provisions of the revenue laws after Congress enacts them. He has no responsibility in the matter of determining how the revenues are to be raised or in advising the Congress how to raise them.

Likewise, the general counsel of the Treasury Department is charged with the responsibility of carrying out the legal aspects of a revenue law after it is enacted by the Congress. He is not looked upon as the financial expert of the Government, and, as a matter of fact, when Mr. Oliphant was before the committee he admitted that in his practice as a lawyer before coming into the Treasury Department, he had not had very much experience in the administration of tax laws, and, as far as I can see, he did not in any way qualify as a tax expert.

These are the men who were sent down by the administration to present the recommendations submitted by the President. To this very hour these experts are unable to give us any definite idea as to the approximate amount of revenue to be derived from the tax on undistributed income; the best they can do is merely to hazard a guess.

You have heard a number of speeches by the proponents of this bill; in my opinion, its simplicity has not as yet been established, and I do not expect that anything I may say on the subject will make it any easier to understand the bill.

Of one thing we may be certain in the passage of this bill, and that is this: That it definitely puts to an end the "breathing spell" which the President several months ago promised to the country; and, of course, the taxpayers were included in that promise. This bill will not only put an end to the normal "breathing" of industry; it will "strangle" it to death.

There is one unusual feature about this piece of legislation, and that is the lack of pride in authorship. I am sure that the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HILL], has no burning desire to be known as the "father" of the bill; and I am sure that the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, gets little consolation in being its "godfather." I am equally certain that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON], who so ably assisted the chairman of the subcommittee in trying to bring some order out of the chaotic proposition sent down from the upper end of Pennsylvania Avenue, will not swell up with pride in being called "uncle."

We must look upon it as being the "stepchild" of the President, for only he truly knows who is the legitimate father, although I am afraid that even he will not recognize it when it returns to the White House to ask for his blessing and approval.

Now, the principle of taxing undistributed corporate income is not a new thing by any means. It has been in operation in a number of European countries for some years past with only nominal success; it has been rejected by others with greater experience in the levying and collection of taxes than we have had. It has been considered by the Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee. Some years back the late Senator Jones, of New Mexico, offered it in the Senate as an amendment to a House bill; it was accepted by the Senate but rejected by the conference committee.

In this connection it might be well to again call your attention to a report made by the chief of staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, of which Mr. L. H. Parker is chief of staff. It is not necessary for me to tell the House anything about Mr. Parker; he is recognized by all of us as a real economist and tax expert. To him and to Mr. Beaman, Chief of the legislative drafting service, is due full credit for putting this bill into shape for parliamentary consideration.

The report to which I refer was issued under date of November 15, 1927. I think it is the first report of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, which committee was created for the purpose, among other things, of investigating "measures and methods for the simplification of internal-revenue taxes, particularly the income tax", the same purpose which the President gave as his reason for suggesting the tax on undistributed corporate income.

To assist Mr. Parker and his technical staff in making this investigation there was named an advisory committee consisting of Dr. T. S. Adams, A. A. Ballantine, George E. Holmes, George O. May, and Dr. Thomas Walker Page, all well known in the field of taxation, economics, and finance, which committee concurred in the findings of the report of the technical staff. On the subject of "undivided profits tax" Mr. Parker had this to say:

> The general basis of such a tax is the imposition of a tax on the undistributed earnings of a corporation in addition to the usual income tax. Such a method may not contemplate the exemption from further tax of such earnings when ultimately distributed. The most obvious objection to such a tax is the burden which it places on legitimate and proper business expansion. As a business expands not only does its plant and property increase but a larger working capital is required, and it is desirable that reasonable accumulations of profits necessary for the expansion and stability of corporations should not be unduly burdened. A tax placed only upon the unnecessary accumulation of capital instead of upon the total accumulation involves many of the difficulties inherent in section 220 and is certainly an impracticable solution of the problem. It is believed that a tax on the total accumulation of profits by corporations is not desirable, because in many cases it might cause the making of unwise distributions and prevent the accumulation of a reasonable and proper surplus.

This legislation is entirely at variance with the previously expressed views of the President. In June 1935 he stated that a graduated income tax was an "equitable" tax and that the principle should be applied to corporations.

That is the principle of the present law, and while the present system is not entirely devoid of the possibilities of leakage and evasion, it is considerably improved over previous acts, and we were gradually working toward its greater perfection.

This tax comes at a time when industry is making valiant efforts to recover from the effects of the depression; a time when there is need for the laying aside of as much of undivided profits as can be spared without injury to the stockholders, in order to be prepared for further crises or depressions.

I shudder to think what would have been the result had not the large corporations of the country, employing hundreds of thousands of our men and women, been prepared to carry through the past 6 years on surpluses which they had built up in prosperous times.

This tax is aimed at the earnings of industrial corporations which have been called upon to take up the slack of unemployment and restore manufacturing and commerce to normalcy.

In his "boy scout" address to the Young Democrats of Maryland, delivered in the city of Baltimore a week or so ago, the President intimated that business and industry must get the people back to work or else the Government would find a way to put them to work, presumably by taking over industry. Apparently he had forgotten all about his suggestions for this new tax scheme when he was addressing these young business men and women, but I doubt that his audience had. If this tax bill will do anything to help speed up industry and get the millions of unemployed people who are now on relief or struggling for existence under the W.

P. A. back to work on livable wages, I have not been able to discover it.

A tax bill of any kind is not a popular thing at any time and for the dominant political party to bring one out in an election year excites the imagination no little as to what is behind it.

Last year's tax bill was a blow at private savings; this bill is a blow at corporate savings. If the supply of capital from private and corporate sources is eliminated, where else is left to turn? Only the State. I have not had the opportunity to check up and find out if the principle of this tax bill may not be just another plank of the Socialist platform.

Of course, the bill which we are now considering is not exactly the scheme sent down by the President. We are indebted to the members of the subcommittee for such modifications as have been made in the application of the principle in cases where it manifestly would be nothing short of ruinous for the profits to be distributed, even against the insistence of the Treasury officials that there be no exceptions whatever from the scheme which they put forward.

This tax scheme will upset the whole present structure of corporate taxation, when recovery hangs more on business stability than upon any other factor.

It is tax complication instead of simplification. It will create more tax litigation and in that respect it does give comfort to the unemployed, for it will mean work for a large number of tax attorneys and tax experts who are not now otherwise employed.

It will bring increased revenues to the Government Treasury when the country is most prosperous and carry us to the other extreme in times of depression.

It will favor well-established and fully financed corporations at the expense of the small corporations struggling for existence.

It will put a disproportionate strain on the small enterprise with modest capital. It will encourage overcapitalization and other questionable methods of financing. It will not hurt big corporations which already have built up surpluses.

It imposes impossible penalties on those who must borrow, who wish to expand, who must make replacement or improvements in plant facilties.

It will penalize the employees of industry by making it impossible for employers to give them any assurance of reasonable continuity of work and wages. It will make for increased unemployment and add to our already burdensome and stubborn relief problems.

We are told in the report of the majority that banks and trust companies are not brought within the new plan but are taxed at a flat rate of 15 percent. "This seems to be a wise public policy", says the report, "since the surplus of banks must be built up for the protection of the depositors."

I submit to you with all fairness the query that if it is a wise public policy for banks and trust companies to build up surpluses for the protection of their depositors, is it not equally a wise public policy to permit corporations to build up surpluses for the protection of their employees, their stockholders, and the general prosperity of the country?

Now, just a word on title III—"Tax on unjust enrichment", as it is expressed in the bill. In his message to the Congress the President referred to the tax covered in this title as "windfall taxes."

Webster's Dictionary defines "windfall" as "something as ripening fruit brought down by the wind"; rotten apples, for instance. Apparently the committee realized that this tax would be in the nature of a "rotten apple" to a great many small processing industries, particularly the independent packers, which were unable to pass on the processing taxes imposed under the A. A. A., and which were not reimbursed under the decision of the Supreme Court declaring the A. A. A. unconstitutional, and therefore thought it advisable to discard the President's designation of this tax for something more dignified and less understandable.

Many of these small industries were unable to pass on the processing tax, as a result of which their financial structures became impaired. A substantial number were unable to survive and were forced into bankruptcy. Those remaining in business are now faced with the possibility of again paying a processing tax under title III, which means that more of these independent establishments will be forced to liquidate.

It is true that the processors will not have to pay this tax if they can prove to the satisfaction of the Internal Revenue Bureau that they did not pass on the processing taxes. But the bill starts out by presuming that they did pass them on, and the burden of proof is on the processors to show that they did not.

That is a simple proposition in the minds of the processors, but those who have had experience with the Internal Revenue Bureau will know that it will be quite a different thing for them to convince the agents of the Bureau. The tax must be paid even if the business shows a net loss for the year. It is just going to be too bad for many of these small processors.

The only comfort that I can get out of this whole proposition is in the belief that when the bill goes over to the Senate the Finance Committee will scrap the whole thing, lock, stock, and barrel, and that a bill will be reported to the Senate that will be helpful to business instead of hurtful, based upon the premise that the framing of a tax bill at this time must be built upon the foundation of an adequate and honest budget of expenditures, including appropriate expenditures for recovery and relief, but excluding wasteful, foolish, and improvident spending.

I think it is well known that few Members of the House on either side of the aisle are wholeheartedly in favor of this bill, and if it were not for the fear of incurring the displeasure of the President there would be sufficient votes coming from the Democratic side to overwhelmingly defeat this measure when it comes to a vote.

Let us put aside partisan politics; let us place the country's welfare above political expediency and personal ambitions and vote this bill down.

REPORT BY GEN. HUGH S. JOHNSON

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution for immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 493

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to the House of Representatives the report submitted to the Administrator of the Works Progress Administration by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson upon completion of his term as administrator of the Works Progress Administration for New York City, N. Y., if not incompatible with the public interest.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report, which is very short, be read.

ADVERSE REPORT (REPT. NO. 2539)

(To accompany H. Res. 493)

The Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, to whom was referred the resolution (H. Res. 493) that the President of the United States be requested to submit to the House of Representatives the report submitted to the Administrator of the Works Progress Administration by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson upon completion of his term as administrator of the Works Progress Administration for New York City, N. Y., if not incompatible with the public interest, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House and recommend that the resolution do not pass.

The action of the committee is based upon the following letter to the chairman of the committee from the Administrator of the Works Progress Administration:

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., April 28, 1936.

Hon. JOHN J. COCHRAN,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN COCHRAN: Gen. Hugh S. Johnson on October 26, 1935, sent me a confidential memorandum expressing his personal views on a number of subjects. This memorandum was sent to me after General Johnson had resigned from the Works Progress Administration.

In this memorandum are a number of references to individuals and agencies outside of the W. P. A. which are of a private and confidential nature.

Very sincerely yours,

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were 178 ayes and 57 noes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 243, nays 98, not voting 86, as follows:

ANCHORAGE COMMERCIAL CO., INC.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 4159) for relief of Anchorage Commercial Co., Inc., with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill

H. R. 4159, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, after "Treasury", insert "be, and he"

Page 1, lines 6 and 7, strike out "any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated" and insert "balances of the appropriations 'Education of natives of Alaska, 1927–28' and 'Education of natives of Alaska, 1928–29', which balances have heretofore been carried to the surplus fund of the Treasury."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman explain what these amendments do in a few words?

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, this is a private claim, and the Senate has so amended it to take the money out of the appropriation for the education of natives in Alaska instead of from the general funds in the Treasury.

Mr. SNELL. Otherwise, there is no material change?

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. No.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were concurred in, and a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in was laid on the table.

REGIMENTATION BY TAXATION

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a radio address which I delivered last evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I insert the following radio address by me:

Every person who is out of employment, every person who has employment and wishes to retain his position, every person who owns a share of stock—in fact, every person who has at heart the welfare of his family and his fellow man—should be opposed to the so-called tax bill now before the Congress.

We are all interested in business recovery. We do not want to enact a stupid, ill-considered, unsound measure that will retard recovery. Already the citizens have suffered too much from business stagnation caused by the hasty enactment of unwise and unconstitutional legislation. It is to point out a few, and only a few, of the adverse effects which this pending tax measure will have upon the business of the country that I respectfully ask your attention during the few minutes allotted to me.

The reason this so-called tax bill is before the Congress at the present time is because the President in a message to the Congress under date of March 3, 1936, urged this legislation as an "important tax reform." In his message the President stated, as an inducement to its enactment, that—

"Such a revision of our corporate taxes would effect great simplification in tax procedure, in corporate accounting, and in the understanding of the whole subject by the citizens of the Nation."

I want to dispose of this subject of "simplification right at the start, otherwise the harassed businessman may be led to believe that his prayer for "simplification" of tax procedure has at last been heard and answered. It is useless to quote in full 16 pages of the pending bill devoted to the subject of "clarification, simplification, and mystification" in tax procedure. I invite the attention of the hopeful and expectant "citizens of the Nation" to this gem of bureaucratic clarity which is supposed to remove the wrinkles of worry from the brow of every puzzled taxpayer.

For the benefit of the businessman who plans to sit down with this tax bill before him and figure out the tax his company is to pay on its undistributed net income, I quote this clear, informative instruction:

"A percentage of the adjusted net income which is more than 10 and less than 20, the tax shall be a percentage of the adjusted net income equal to the sum of 4, plus one-half of the amount by which the percentage which the undistributed net income is of the adjusted net income exceeds 10."

Lest this clarifying language may not be as clear as crystal to the average taxpayer, the "brain trust" further submits this formula:

"If the percentage which the undistributed net income is of the adjusted net income is not one of the percentages of the adjusted net income shown in schedule I or II, the rate of tax shall be proportionate, being interpolated by the straight-line method: That is, by the formula

X = rate of tax on adjusted net income;
a = percent of undistributed net income to adjusted net income;
b = bracket percentage next smaller than "a";
c = bracket percentage next larger than "a"; d = rate of tax on bracket next smaller than "a"; and e = rate of tax on bracket next larger than "a."

Can a bewildered public ask anything simpler than this? If still in doubt as to the necessity of this formula, do not venture to ask further enlightenment for this sacred formula is intended to bring peace and perfect rest to the tired and feverish brain of the confused taxpayer. It is a gift from the bureaucratic gods of the New Deal. So much for the promise of simplification.

Let us not be deceived. This is not in reality a revenue bill. It is simply another Executive "must" regimentation measure. The real purpose is not primarily to obtain revenue but to substitute bureaucratic management for private judgment in business. Dictatorial control over private business is the real purpose of the system of taxation proposed in the pending bill, not revenue.

If the real purpose is to obtain revenue, why abandon the present system, which will yield over $1,000,000,000, and substitute an untried, untested, and discredited theory, advocated by no one experienced in the field of taxation. Why replace a system of taxation that has proved effective with an experimental plan supported only by Communists, Socialists, and those who desire to have our Government own and dominate all business?

In brief, under this tax it is proposed to discard the present system of taxing corporations upon the income which they earn and substitute instead a tax measured by the amounts saved by corporations for the future needs of their business, or to tide them over lean periods that may be ahead. The greater the saving the higher the rate of tax becomes. Under this tax, if a corporation having an income of more than $10,000 seeks to save all of its earnings in any one year to meet an emergency it would be taxed at the rate of 42½ percent, and would be able to lay aside for future needs scarcely more than half of the amount that it has earned. On the other hand, if a corporation paid all of its earnings out in dividends—and saved nothing at all—it would go tax-free. Under the present tax all corporation income, saved or paid out, is taxed at from 12½ to 15 percent.

Is it not obvious that many corporations, especially the financially strong ones, will escape all taxation under the proposed plan? And is it not equally clear that thousands of business concerns not financially fortified with large reserves will be ruined if they distribute their surplus, and that they will be destroyed by the tax if they attempt to retain the surplus which business prudence commends? This is an application of the communistic "death sentence" with a vengeance. It is the financially weak corporations, however, that will be guillotined. The lusty monopolistic concerns will escape both death and taxation, and thrive as a result of the elimination of their small competitors.

If this tax is adopted we will be taxing savings and not income. We will penalize thrift and encourage extravagance that must result in bankruptcy.

The Republican Party is opposed to the adoption of this bill. This opposition is not based upon party considerations. The Republican Party's record of cooperation with the present administration on legislation which was clearly designed to cope with the emergency, and to foster national economic recovery, conclusively demonstrates its ability to rise above partisanship when the welfare of the American Nation is at stake.

Our opposition is based upon two major considerations. First, because the proposed tax will not bring in an appreciable increase in revenue; and second, because of its thoroughly destructive character and the harm that it will do to everyone who works for a living.

The situation is this: We are asked to throw overboard a tried and proven system of taxation, the yield from which can be estimated with reasonable accuracy, and to gamble instead with an unsound scheme which has been rejected by Congress for the past 16 years.

There would be some justification for considering measures to raise additional revenues if they were a part of a well-devised program to balance the Federal Budget, a program which would contemplate reduction of expenditures by elimination of present scoop-shovel spending methods, as well as increasing taxes. To such a plan properly conceived and well developed, the Republican Party will give its most friendly and cooperative attention. But we cannot subscribe to a subterfuge such as this proposed tax bill presents.

No party which is sincerely devoted to the welfare of the American people can do anything but oppose stoutly a tax measure which gambles with existing revenues in favor of a crackpot proposal that goes against all practical experience.

Our second principal reason for opposing the tax bill is the ruinous effect which it is certain to have not alone upon business, not alone upon corporations, but upon all who work for a living, and thereby play their part in our national system of productive enterprise.

This proposal ignores all experience with similar tax schemes. It ignores all study of similar measures by other countries with far more experience than ourselves with income taxes. Our British friends, for example, have been experimenting with income taxation for over a century—we for less than one generation. A commission of the British Government for 3 years studied a plan similar to this one and then rejected it as unworkable. Yet we are asked to adopt such a tax bill that was only formulated a few days ago. But that, I regret to say, seems to be the way things are done under the New Deal. We are asked to act first and think about the consequences afterward.

The attitude of the administration in proposing this tax measure is reminiscent of the man who was brought into police court, charged with having thrown a stone through a window the night before while drunk. His defense was that at the moment it seemed to him a good thing to do.

Representatives of business throughout the United States—chiefly little business—have come forward to tell about the destructive effects that this bill would have upon them, their business, and their employees. These protests confirm, as nothing else could, the impression my associates and I had formed of the destructive character of this proposal.

Specifically, what will this bill do? What will it do to the small business man, to the wage earner, and to the small investor? I am not concerned here in talking about its effects upon big business or upon the rich. They can take care of themselves under any system. What you and I are interested in is the effect of this measure upon the rank and file of Americans who make from $20 to $50 to $60 a week, the people who constitute the backbone of this great Nation.

First, it would penalize the time-proven policy of saving for a rainy day.

The idea of this tax is to force the distribution of corporate earnings in the form of dividends, regardless of conditions which may demand that earnings be laid aside for future needs. As I have already mentioned, the rate of the tax increases rapidly in proportion to the amount saved. The rate schedule is so devised that if a corporation desires to save more than three-tenths of its earnings, it must pay a dollar in tax for every additional dollar it saves.

The practical effect of this policy of forbidden savings leads to the second fundamental objection to the bill.

It would increase unemployment in times of depression.

With the accumulation of savings for lean years prevented, or seriously impeded, business concerns will be less able to survive future depressions. Bankruptcies will increase. Unemployment, with all of its deplorable hardships, will be vastly greater in its magnitude.

You may ask, What good have the past savings of corporations done in the present depression? Well, as one great American would say, let's look at the record.

During the 5 years, 1930 through 1934, savings accumulated from past periods of prosperity enabled the manufacturing industry alone to keep on its pay roll 1,300,000 more persons than were required to produce the current output. Wages paid to this group totaled $5,800,000,000—about $1,100,000,000 a year. In other words, if corporations had not saved in the past, there would have been during this depression 1,300,000 more unemployed than we have had. Between five and six million more persons would have been added to the relief rolls. Yet we are told by advocates of this bill that business savings are improper and unjustified.

Third, adoption of this tax would prevent the development and growth of new business enterprises.

The story of American industrial progress is a familiar one. We all know about the growth of the great milling industry from small beginnings in local gristmills, the development of the modern steel mill from the local foundry, the growth of the village smithy into the modern agricultural-implement factory, and the like. None of these developments could have taken place had not proprietors "plowed back" into their small businesses a substantial portion of their earnings each year. Yet this proposed tax would hinder, if not prevent, any further development of American industry by this means.

I should like to discuss other unsound features of this bill, but time will not permit. I wish to say in conclusion if you believe that America can progress no further, and that new inventions and new products are a thing of the past, then perhaps you will favor this tax bill. If, however, you share my confidence in the future development of our American civilization, undoubtedly you will feel with me that no tax bill which will impede our industrial development should be allowed to pass.

THE TAX BILL

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Speaker, it is not a pleasant duty for one to vote to place additional burdens of taxation upon the people of the Nation.

It is more to be desired, however, than to continue the expenditures of money without providing the means of raising the sums necessary. What has made it necessary for this tax proposal? First, we need $500,000,000 for the new farm program and $120,000,000 a year for the payment of the adjusted-service certificates of the veterans. Both are just debts. In addition there are $517,000,000 needed to meet outstanding obligations that the Government now owes to the farmers under the old A. A. A. Divide this up in 3 years and you will have about $172,000,000 a year which is necessary to pay these farmers what the Government has contracted and agreed to pay. In the bill before us we provide a windfall tax which is estimated to yield $100,000,000 and a capital stock tax which is estimated to yield $83,000,000 or a total of $183,000,000 to take care of the $172,000,000.

I have heard the opponents of this bill say that the measure will not provide the amount necessary, and then in the next breath argue that the bill will not produce any revenue at all, that it will ruin business, and so on. This simply does not make sense to me, for if it will not produce any revenue it certainly cannot hurt business. I have listened to so much of this calamity howling that I pay no attention to it any more, for the records of this administration prove conclusively that during the 3 years of the present administration business has recovered to the point where leaders in industry are now making public statements to the effect that business is back to normal and that we have passed the worst in our national depression and that we are back on our feet again. Surely no one can say that the action of this administration has injured business in the face of the record. I was greatly interested in a statement I read the other day in a local Washington newspaper, the statement handed out by the president of the great Chamber of Commerce of the United States, in which he paints a most rosy picture of the great strides that have been made during the past year and the fine business gains that have been made. He is quoted as saying that many industries are now working day and night shifts in order to fill orders. The business charts published by antiadministration organizations clearly indicate the same upward trend in every line of human endeavor. I have studied the pending revenue bill very carefully. I have listened attentively to the statements made by the members of the committee and subcommittee who held hearings and wrote the bill. I am convinced that no member of that great Ways and Means Committee would want to urge the passage of any legislation that would bring injury to anyone, for these men are just as patriotic and interested in others as is any other group of our people. Our Government has been obliged to go to the rescue of the States and municipalities in order to care for their people. We have had to use the strong arm of Government credit in order to save these communities from evils that no one might have been able to foresee, and as a result we have saved them, and by saving them we saved the Nation.

It is true that we have had to spend money, and it may be true that more money will have to be spent; but to me it is perfectly clear that, unless we do this, we shall throw back upon local communities burdens that will be unable for them to bear and bring greater burdens of taxation upon our people, caused by what I deem to be the unwise and short-sightedness of our business leaders. While it is true that business is back to normal in most parts of the country, it is likewise true that human hands are being supplanted by machines, contributing to more unemployment. If industry insists upon installing labor-supplanting machines and thus contribute to more unemployment, surely someone must care for those human hands that are being supplanted; so that it becomes the painful duty of the Congress to find means of raising money to finance these burdens caused by industry and its unwillingness to cooperate, through the spreading of employment and the payment of a decent living wage. If money is needed, then it must come from someone.

I will not vote to place a heavier burden upon our great middle class and small-business men and corporations. They have always paid more than their fair share of the taxes, while the large corporations have evaded their fair share because of existing laws. I certainly would be the last man in this House to advocate any tax bill that might injure our people, but I know that this is a step in the right direction and will be a more equitable measure than we now have. I know that this bill is in the interest of the people I have the honor to represent, for many of them hold stocks upon which they are paid small dividends, while most of the earnings are denied to them so as to avoid taxation. Most of the corporations in my district will be benefited, for many of them are small and already paying more than their share of taxes, while under this present proposal their taxes will be no more and in many instances less.

Under this present proposal corporations will pay no taxes if they distribute their earnings to their stockholders. We are trying to equalize taxation under this proposal, something that we have never done since we have had the income-tax laws on the statute books. If corporations choose to pay better wages and in this way distribute more of their profits, we will have contributed much to our recovery; and as I understand it, that is one of the objectives we have in mind. As was stated, Mr. Speaker, by the chairman of the committee, the bill is based upon justice, equality, and a sounder principle than is now in existence. It must also be borne in mind that the existing surpluses and reserves of corporations are not taxed; they remain in the future as they now exist. It should also be borne in mind that all existing corporation taxes under this plan are repealed. The corporation income taxes, the capital-stock tax, and the present excess-profit taxes are repealed, and this new plan of taxation is to take its place; and in this connection let me say that under this proposal we look to the future and do not look back into the past. The records show that there has been such a vast amount of tax evasion—more than $1,600,000,000 annually—which means that about four to five billion dollars a year are being piled up in enormous surpluses by corporations in the country. We want them to distribute these earnings among the men and women who have invested in their stocks, thus creating more purchasing power as well as cause these folks to invest in other stocks and securities and at the same time pay their fair share of the taxes.

The bill does not "hamstring" any corporation. In the future, as in the past, a corporation may have all the surplus and all the reserve that it wants to have. Its business can be conducted as it pleases or its better judgment dictates. This tax plan simply provides that whatever net income the corporation has, its earnings and its profits shall go through the tax mill just like any other individual or partnership, or your money and mine. I can see nothing unfair about it. It will contribute to not only an increase in revenue to the Government but will induce our people to invest their savings in corporations who are successful and who can show them a return for their investment. The bill, as I see it, Mr. Speaker, tries to—and I am sure will—close up those loopholes through which so many evasions have resulted.

The rank and file of American people expect the Congress to do this, for I think every Member of this House can testify to the dissatisfaction in their districts on the part of our great middle class and small-business men, who long ago recognized the inequalities of our tax system. Summed up briefly, let me quote the words of Mr. COOPER of Tennessee, a distinguished member of the Ways and Means Committee, who said:

> You simply ask the corporations two questions at the end of the year under this plan. The first is, What was your net income; what did you make? If they answer that, then the next question is, What did you do with it; did you pay it out in dividends to your stockholders? If you did, you do not owe us a dime; but if you did not pay it out to your stockholders, then you owe us a tax on it.

In those words you state a simple explanation of this proposal. To me it is fair and just. To me it will mean a more equal tax program, a program that I will be glad to support because I believe it will spread wealth, it will distribute profits; it will contribute to better wages; it will give more purchasing power to the masses. This leads to better economic conditions and will contribute to human happiness.

But, Mr. Speaker, I hear some say, "Stop spending money; cut out a lot of these Government activities." I am sure every Member of the Congress would wish that local communities could care for their own, so that we might not be called upon to appropriate money to care for their citizens. To throw this burden back upon local communities would mean, in many of our large centers of population, a burden that these communities cannot bear. It would mean raising taxes upon their people, and practically in every instance that additional tax would fall upon real estate, which is now heavily taxed.

The better plan, Mr. Speaker, would be for our great group of employers of labor to pay a decent living wage, spread employment through shorter hours, contribute to the employment of men and women who would rather work and earn their bread by the sweat of their brows than to receive relief. Relief, Mr. Speaker, is repugnant to the great mass of our people, and I hope and pray to God that the day is not far distant when we will have a job for every man and woman who wants to work, and at an adequate wage that will permit our people to not only buy the necessities of life but these luxuries that are so dear to our people.

An employed people are a happy people. Unemployment and low wages will ruin this Nation, and unwise indeed is the man or woman in industry who does not want to do his or her share toward better conditions. The permanency of the Nation rests upon these truths, and the sooner we realize it the better off we will be.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 215, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 10, strike out "March" and insert "September."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in, and a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in was laid on the table.

THE FLORIDA CROSS-STATE CANAL

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, Secretary of War Dern is in Florida on an inspection tour of our rivers and harbors and the cross-State canal. I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a few quotations from Secretary Dern on the feasibility of the Florida cross-State canal.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following quotations from Secretary of War Dern on the feasibility of the Florida cross-State canal, published recently in the Jacksonville Journal:

Secretary of War George H. Dern endorsed the Gulf-Atlantic Ship Canal today as a "feasible and worth-while project."

"People who deride the proposed waterway as an impractical scheme don't know what they are talking about", he told the Journal.

He was to leave this afternoon for Ocala, where he will confer with Col. Brehon Somervell, chief of the Ocala district of the United States Army Engineers, who is in charge of construction of the canal project.

Army Engineers are an integral part of the War Department, which is headed by Secretary Dern, and it is under him that all work has been done on the canal since President Roosevelt made his initial allotment to the project.

"There has been some talk of the water supply of the State being affected by the canal", Mr. Dern said. "As a result of advice by expert geologists we have reached the conclusion that there is only remote, if any, danger at all from its construction.

"Two years ago, even, we were told that should such an emergency arise the situation could be met. The Engineers have guarded against this."

REPORT OF GEN. HUGH S. JOHNSON

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] may have 5 minutes in which to address the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the minority seem to have very small rights, and inasmuch as the House has refused to demand the report of Gen. Hugh S. Johnson regarding W. P. A. activities, just a word of lamentation should perhaps be permitted. We are about to consider an additional appropriation of a billion and a half dollars to be expended under W. P. A. That report from a public administrator of an important post like New York City should be valuable, because it should be of great advantage to this House in the consideration of further W. P. A. appropriations. I remind the House, however, that certain newspapers did get hold of that report and portions of it have been freely circulated. Copies are obtainable, and while gentlemen may say we can only assume the truth of it, yet General Johnson in his own column tacitly admitted that the quoted criticisms were correct. Therefore we can quote those portions of his report as genuine copy. He said that the next time he makes a report, it will be sent to the bottom of a well in Indian sign language.

I desire to suggest to the House that we may quote him and inform the public as to his real opinion of the W. P. A. He was the darling of you people when he was favorable to you and "cracking down" on others, but now you do not want to listen at all to what he says. Where is your watchword? Pitiless publicity. This is the public business, and you are trying to keep it from the public. It is not private business. Lest I be too serious, I would compare it to the case where a young lady anonymously advertised for a male hiking companion for 2 weeks, and then they asked her if she would disclose the names of the 100 applicants. She said, "No; it has already made an awful row. Father was one of the applicants." [Laughter.] You are indeed afraid somebody pretty close to the administration will be mentioned. Why should they not be, if they are attending to the public business? I think it is no secret for me to say that in committee I asked that this report might be sent to the committee or a subcommittee for us to look it over and see if it was not compatible with the public interest to disclose it. But very quickly both in the House and in the committee the report is smothered. Oh, why are you so cowardly about it? General Johnson still loves his President. He is very loyal to him. He is only trying to be helpful in his criticisms. Why do you not listen to him? [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 460.

House Resolution 460

Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a select committee of five Members of the House and that such committee is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study of all the activities of the departments, bureaus, boards, commissions, independent agencies, and all other agencies of the executive branch of the Government with a view to determining whether the activities of any such agency conflict with or overlap the activities of any other such agency and whether, in the interest of simplification, efficiency, and economy, any of such agencies should be coordinated with other agencies or abolished, or the personnel thereof reduced. The committee shall report to the House (or to the Speaker of the House, if the House is not in session) the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation.

That said committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or adjourned; to hold such hearings; to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents by subpena or otherwise and to take such testimony as it deems necessary. Subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the Speaker of the House of Representatives or the chairman of said committee, and shall be served by any person designated by them or either of them. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Every person who having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee or any subcommittee thereof willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any questions pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102, chapter 7, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, second edition, 1878.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY].

I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, on March 20 last the President of the United States addressed to the Speaker of the House a communication in writing, which I will ask to have the Clerk read for the information of the Members.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the communication.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 20, 1936.

Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
The Speaker, United States House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Last October I began holding some conversations with interested and informed persons concerning what appealed to me as the necessity of making a careful study of the organization of the executive branch of the Government.

Many new agencies have been created during the emergency, some of which will, with the recovery, be dropped or greatly curtailed, while others, in order to meet the newly realized needs of the Nation, will have to be fitted into the permanent organization of the executive branch. One object of such a study would be to determine the best way to fit the newly created agencies, or such parts of them as may become more or less permanent, into the regular organization. To do this adequately and to assure the proper administrative machinery for the sound management of the executive branch it is, in my opinion, necessary also to study as carefully as may be the existing regular organization. Conversations on this line were carried on by me during November and December, and I then determined to appoint a committee which would assist me in making such a study, with the primary purpose of considering the problem of administrative management. It is my intention shortly to name such a committee, with instructions to make its report to me in time so that the recommendations which may be based on the report may be submitted to the Seventy-fifth Congress.

The Senate has named a special committee to consider aspects of this general problem, and I respectfully suggest that the House of Representatives also create a special committee of a similar character through which the House of Representatives could cooperate with me and with the committee that I shall name in making this study, in order that duplication of effort in the task of research may be avoided and to the end that this study may be made as fruitful as possible.

Very sincerely yours,

(Signed) FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think those of you who had the opportunity to listen to the reading of this letter from the President have observed what we had in mind in bringing in this resolution. You will note this communication was addressed to the Speaker of the House, and at the request of the Speaker I introduced the resolution which is now pending before the House for consideration.

This question of an effort to reorganize the departments of the Government is not a new problem for Congress. Since I have been a Member of this House, at least one rather pretentious effort was made along this line, but, unfortunately, for reasons which are not now necessary to state, it did not effectuate any useful purpose or the objective that it had in mind.

If you will recall the statement of the President in the letter just read, you will see he makes the statement that there are a great many bureaus and agencies of the present Federal Government which have been brought into existence by reason of the great emergency through which we have passed for the last 3 or 4 years. In addition to that there already existed a great many permanent bureaus and divisions of the Government which have been in existence for a number of years, and it has always been my personal opinion that there has been and is now, probably more now than ever before in the history of our Government, for the reasons which I have just stated, a great opportunity, by careful, prudent, scientific, and courageous investigation of those bureaus, for the Congress of the United States, by proper legislation, to greatly effect economies in public expenses by cutting out duplication of effort, by the overlapping of various agencies which are performing practically the same functions, and at the same time to greatly promote the efficiency of the management and operation of our Government activities. I think this question is one of very great interest and of great importance to the American people. This ought not be a partisan question. All of us are naturally concerned about expenditures by our Federal Government. [Applause.]

I am glad for this response from the gentleman from the State of Pennsylvania, because I feel I have touched a sympathetic note in his heart when I make that statement. [Laughter and applause.]

However, as prudent legislators, we ought not overlook any possible opportunity to reduce the permanent expenditures of our Government by legislation of this character if it is possible to do so. I am not deceiving myself about the difficulty that will confront this committee appointed by the House. Already the Senate has set up a select committee for this same purpose and the President of the United States, as indicated in that letter and subsequently carried into effect, I understand, has appointed a committee upon the part of the Executive to make research along these lines. It may occur to some that it might be a waste of time or a conflict of jurisdiction to set up three different entities to investigate the same problem, but, of course, as pointed out in the President's letter, it is the purpose of those who are sponsoring this proposition that all three of those agencies shall collaborate in their efforts and shall undertake, as far as possible, to reach a common conclusion and to make recommendation to the Congress of the United States for its consideration.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. MICHENER. Would these three separate agencies act separately or together? The gentleman said it was the purpose that they will work together. Will each committee be pursuing its own course, or will they work together?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understand the gentleman's question, and I will answer it. Of course, under this resolution we will have a House committee. Under the Senate resolution there is a Senate committee, and under the President's action there is an executive committee. Although they may have individual entities as such, the purpose is, and I think the results will show, that there shall be cooperation in effort and investigation and in action at the end of their labors. That certainly is the thought the President had in mind, it is certainly the thought I had in mind in presenting this resolution for the appointment of the House committee.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. RICH. A resolution was brought before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, having for its purpose the appointment of a committee similar to the one provided for in the pending resolution. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] chairman of this committee, tried to secure the cooperation of the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee but met with no success. I cannot understand, if that was his experience, how the gentleman expects this effort to work out in harmony.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I was not, of course, familiar with the matter of which the gentleman speaks, but I think it will be entirely possible to secure the type of cooperation we seek.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Unless there are some questions I think I have made the statement I desire to make. I hope the House will adopt the resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have sometimes wondered if the House is absolutely devoid of common sense when it comes to taking responsibility as to spending the people's money. I listened very intently to what the majority leader had to say in regard to this resolution. I am in entire accord with his statement concerning the need for a less extensive organization to run the various departments of the Government. There is no doubt but what there are duplications and many unnecessary commissions that have been established, especially during the last 3 years, and there is no doubt of this duplication, and it should be eradicated, but that is not the question before the House. The question is whether we shall have three separate investigations when the Senate has an investigation going at the present time. I do not consider a single statement the majority leader made as a real reason why the House should set up a committee of its own to make this investigation—an investigation similar to one the Senate is conducting at the present time. In fact, he carefully avoided the real question at issue. I understand, but I am not positive, that the President has also set up an executive commission to do similar work. Further along this same line I ask if anyone has ever known a case where three separate and distinct commissions were able to make an investigation of the same subject and agree in the final analysis of the proposition?

I wonder what made the President so deeply interested in this proposition all of a sudden that he sent a letter to the Speaker asking him to appoint a special committee? If I remember correctly, in that letter he said he was thinking about this last October. Why did he begin thinking then? As a matter of cold fact, does not the President have complete and entire authority to do every single thing suggested at the present time? Did he not receive that authority in the Economy Act passed 3 years ago last spring? Did not Mr. Douglas make complete investigation along this line and several recommendations? So far as I know, very few of his recommendations were ever carried out or put into effect.

Does anyone remember the House ever starting an investigation when the Senate already has investigating going on the same subject? So far as I know, that has never been the policy. There must be something back of this not mentioned in the President's letter; and, in my judgment, it is exactly this: The administration was afraid of the unfavorable developments that might possibly come out of the Byrd committee that has started this investigation in the Senate. If the President appoints a commission to act in cooperation with the Byrd committee, and if the House appoints another committee with that distinct purpose in mind, the probabilities are there will be enough New Deal sympathizers on this whole proposition that nothing will come out in the report unfavorable to the various New Deal commissions the President has established during his present administration. Is not this the real argument and reason back of the movement? If not, why should he ask us to duplicate work already being carried on by the Senate, and especially so since, if he wants this reorganization brought about, he already has the necessary power to do it himself? No new information has come out in regard to this.

Let me refer briefly to the attitude of the Senate in regard to these joint commissions, including members appointed by the Executive. The older Members of the House will remember that 6 or 7 years ago we started an investigation on the sinking of the submarine S–4. The House passed a resolution seeking the appointment of a joint commission to be composed of Members of the Senate, the House, and members appointed by the Chief Executive. This resolution was passed in the House. The Senate passed a joint resolution providing simply for a committee of the House and the Senate. The two Houses went into conference on the matter. I remember it well, because I was one of the conferees. We were in conference 3 or 4 months. The Senate took the position they would not yield to any such proposition as that contained in the House resolution. They said it is purely a question for the legislative branch, it is their prerogative, and we will not join in any commission a part of whose members represent the Executive. This matter was fully and completely discussed in the United States Senate, the leader in that debate at that time being the present Secertary of the Navy, Senator Swanson. It was also discussed by several Senators who are still Members of the Senate; and the Senate by an overwhelming vote sustained the position of their conferees—that they would not join in any such joint investigation. And I am reliably informed that they have expressed the same opinion in regard to a proposed investigation suggested by Members of the House on this same proposition.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is there anything that can prevent the President from appointing his own committee to look into this matter?

Mr. SNELL. Not a single thing in the world. He may do it any time he wants to; but I claim that doing it in this way, according to the letter which has been read, is purely a political proposition.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. If I understand the gentleman correctly, he maintains that under the Economy Act passed on March 20, 1933, the President has the power to regroup, consolidate, and eliminate?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. May I remind the gentleman that the express terms of section 409 of the Economy Act provided that all recommendations and reports for regrouping should be submitted within 2 years. That 2 years expired on March 20, 1935, more than a year ago.

Mr. SNELL. That is even worse than I thought, because he has practically not made a single move or a single recommendation to the Congress in the 2 years.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true the President submitted 17 reports and Executive orders before the 2 years expired, and made 17 regroupings and reconsolidations?

Mr. SNELL. Where are they and what became of them?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. They were all submitted to Congress, and I have a memorandum covering every one of them.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman's party has been in control, but the recommendations and memoranda have never been offered to the House. The responsibility is on the gentleman's side and you have not done anything.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true that under the terms of the law the recommendations did not have to be approved by the House or the Senate, and went into effect unless rejected by the House or the Senate?

Mr. SNELL. Has any of them been put into effect?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Yes; every one of the 17 has been put into effect.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman does not seem to realize what the President has accomplished under the particular section contained in the Economy Act to which reference has been made.

Mr. SNELL. I know the President has not done away with one-tenth as many commissions as he has established new ones.

Mr. COCHRAN. That might be true. It cannot all be done in a few months.

Mr. SNELL. Well, that is all there is to the proposition; it is just political and for the purpose of having a majority on the committees that will protect the administration.

Mr. COCHRAN. The President sent 17 recommendations to the Congress, and when the Congress did not veto those recommendations, as the law provided, within a given period, those Executive orders became law.

Mr. SNELL. The President has failed lamentably along this line. He has had this power all along, and the matter has been very poorly handled as far as this administration is concerned. The only reason for offering this resolution now is to try to prevent the Byrd committee from bringing out something that may be unfavorable to the present New Deal commissions and bureaus that have been brought into existence by the present administration and every man who has given it any thought knows it. There is no precedent anywhere for establishing this kind of a commission to work separately and independently from the others and then try to get something like unanimous recommendations as a conclusion.

The thing you should do at the present time, if you are not satisfied with what the Senate committee is doing, is to bring in a joint resolution making the recommendation that the Senate and the House do the investigating; but unless the Senate has changed its position, and it was very pronounced before, they will not join with the House in making this general investigation together with the executive commission appointed by the President.

Mr. President, I can see no reason whatever for this resolution except to add more expense and perhaps it will provide more Democratic jobs before the investigation is completed. If there was any real reason back of this, I think the majority leader would have presented it to the House. The only reason he has presented this resolution is on account of the general conditions which exist at the present time, and we all agree they do exist. However, I am absolutely opposed to having three separate commissions make this investigation at the same time and engaging in a duplication of effort. I doubt if there is a Member of this House who can given any reasonable excuse for making this investigation, except a lack of interest in spending the people's money. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope the resolution will be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back 18 minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] is an excellent legislator. He knows as well as I do that if the Senate is going to make an investigation in regard to reorganizing Government agencies a bill must be reported to the Senate, and if passed by the Senate and comes to the House it will go to a House committee, which committee, naturally, will be required to make some investigation before presenting a report to the House, unless the House has a committee working with the Senate committee.

In the last session of the Congress, when I was in the hospital, at the last meeting of the committee of which I happen to be chairman, a resolution was passed authorizing the chairman to appoint a subcommittee to make an investigation and to report to the full committee, which report would contain such recommendations as they might advance with regard to reorganization of Government agencies. I returned to my office about the middle of October after an absence of 6 months. I did not go home. I remained in Washington throughout the fall and winter and spent a great deal of time securing information for this subcommittee to work on when I could get a meeting. I wrote to every member of the committee and asked if they were in position to come back in December and serve on that subcommittee. The Members had been in Washington up to September, and naturally they wanted to stay at home. Nobody could blame them for that. I continued to prepare for the subcommittee which would be ready when Congress convened.

Mr. Speaker, I have in my office a pile of documents from every Government agency showing their set-up, the amount they are spending, the number of employees in every division, together with the duties of those employees. When the Congress assembled in January I appointed a subcommittee to go into this matter. This requires a tremendous amount of work, as the gentleman from New York knows. Then came the Senate resolution. It was a Senate resolution, not a concurrent or joint resolution.

My subcommittee authorized me to confer with Senator BYRD, who introduced the Senate resolution, and I did on a number of occasions. I may say that Senator BYRD, I think, was very sympathetic with what I was trying to accomplish—have a resolution passed providing for a joint committee. In the end, however, a Senate committee was appointed. Senator BYRD said he would be glad to have a subcommittee of my committee sit in on the hearings and investigations which the Senate would make. Then the President announced he was going to appoint a committee. I personally called this matter to the attention of the President and last winter suggested that a committee be appointed by the President to make an investigation of all Government departments, to secure data upon which he could make recommendations to the Congress.

Despite the fact that the President was working night and day when we passed the Economy Act, giving him certain powers to effect reorganizations and consolidations, Mr. Roosevelt issued 17 Executive orders. Under that act the President submitted, as required, the Executive orders to the Congress; the Executive orders were referred to my committee, and in every instance the committee stood squarely behind the President. There was no recommendation of a veto, which power the Congress had, and after the required period the Executive orders became law. I am sure if the President had had the time he would have accomplished much more than he did; but you remember the condition of the country and what faced the President in the 2 years that he had the power to act. I have gone along with the President in the past and will do so in the future. He shows his desire to accomplish something more along this line by his action in appointing a committee to represent him. No one should say there is politics in this matter. It is too big a subject, one that the entire country is interested in. The gentleman from New York knows the opposition that develops when reorganization plans are submitted. It is my view the House and Senate committees, together with the President's committee, will work in harmony, and something worth while will develop as a result. Both political parties always mention reorganization and consolidation in their platforms. They will do so again this year, and the people will expect something to be done. The passage of this resolution, it appears to me, will be the proper way to get information that will result in beneficial legislation.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield for a question.

Mr. SNELL. Can the gentleman from Missouri, who is always an economist, give us any reason why we should make three separate and distinct investigations?

Mr. COCHRAN. I think the gentleman knows just as well as I know that the three committees will make a joint investigation.

Mr. SNELL. How are you going to meet the position which the Senate has always taken, that they will positively not have a joint investigation?

Mr. COCHRAN. The benefit will be that after any proposed legislation goes through the Senate you will have a House committee that will be advised in reference to such legislation and you will not have to start all over again and make an investigation after a bill comes here from the Senate. There is no doubt in my mind but that when the Speaker names the House committee the Senate committee will ask that the three committees work together.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not a fact that the archives of the Senate and House are full of information about all these matters and that we have had complete investigations, but nothing has been done?

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes; but our archives are not full of real information. The real information lies within the walls of Government buildings. How about the new agencies that have been created as a result of the emergency? No information is available about them.

Mr. SNELL. That is where this information was taken from.

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes; but you do not get real information until you get into the Government departments. In my opinion, this is certainly a step in the right direction.

The Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments has worked hard on this matter. It was ready to go ahead when the Senate stepped in with its investigating committee. Then the members of the subcommittee saw no reason to spend a great deal of time and bring in a bill, because the Senate would certainly have delayed action until the next session, because its committee will not report until then. I followed every suggestion of the committee, Democrat and Republican members being in full accord. Time after time I discussed the matter with Senator BYRD and others, and I can only repeat what I have said before, and that is when the Speaker names this committee I am confident, no matter who is selected, the Senate committee and the President's committee will be found working together at all times. If this plan is worked out, then when the time comes to offer legislation to carry out the recommendations of the committees the bill can be prepared by both committees and introduced in both Houses on the same day.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, this resolution provides for the triplication of the work of studying duplication. [Laughter.] As the distinguished leader of the Republican minority has well pointed out, two committees have already been appointed, one by the President and one by the Senate, to make the same study that this resolution proposes that a House committee shall make.

It is absurd to have three committees doing the same thing. What greater waste of time and money could be imagined? Reorganizing the executive departments is a job of experts. Is it proposed that these three separate committees shall employ three separate staffs of experts, have the same witnesses appear before the three different committees, and triplicate the work of one another in other respects?

Congress had an experience recently which shows how impracticable it is to have separate committees doing the same thing. They hinder rather than advance the cause for which they are appointed, and just naturally work at cross-purposes. At the last session of Congress both Houses appointed a lobby committee. Immediately each committee set out to outdo the other, not only in its work but in publicity. One vied with the other in subpenaing important witnesses and to bring out their testimony first. The situation became so acute that in one instance a witness was actually threatened with punishment of contempt for failure to appear before one of the committees in answer to its subpena when he was actually testifying before the other. The House committee soon saw the absurdity of the situation and very properly brought its investigation to a close as promptly as possible. The Senate committee is still functioning.

The appointment of three separate committees to reorganize the executive departments will delay rather than advance the cause of reorganization. If it is desirable—and I think it is—to have both branches of the Congress and the executive departments represented in such an investigation, then it ought to be done by one committee on which all three are represented. When I saw this matter coming along I introduced a resolution in the House of Representatives to provide for the appointment of a committee consisting of 15 members, 5 to be appointed by the President, 5 by the Senate, and 5 by the House of Representatives. Such a committee would do away with duplication and triplication of work and give all parties representation. My resolution is as follows:

House Joint Resolution 561

Joint resolution to create a Committee on the Reorganization of the Executive Branch of the Government

Resolved, etc., That a committee is hereby created to be known as the Committee on the Reorganization of the Executive Branch of the Government, which shall consist of 15 members, 5 individuals to be appointed by the President of the United States, 5 Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and 5 Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The President shall designate a chairman from among the members of the committee. Vacancies occurring in the membership of the committee shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointments.

SEC. 2. The committee is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study of all the activities of the departments, bureaus, boards, commissions, independent agencies, and all other agencies of the executive branch of the Government, with a view to determining whether the activities of any such agency conflict with or overlap the activities of any other such agency and whether, in the interest of simplification, efficiency, and economy any of such agencies should be coordinated with other agencies or abolished, or the personnel thereof reduced.

SEC. 3. That the committee shall report to both the Senate and House of Representatives the results of its inquiries, together with its recommendations, and shall prepare and submit bills or resolutions having for their purpose the coordination of Government functions and their most efficient and economical conduct, and the final report of said committee shall be submitted not later than February 1, 1937. The committee is authorized to employ such assistance as it may require, at such compensation as the committee may determine to be just and reasonable, and to make such reasonable expenditures as may be necessary for the proper conduct of its work, such expenditures to be paid in equal parts from the contingent funds of the Senate and the House of Representatives, as from time to time may be duly authorized by resolutions of those bodies.

SEC. 4. That the officers and employees of all executive services of the Government shall furnish to the committee such information regarding powers, duties, activities, organization, and methods of business as the committee may from time to time require, and the committee or any of its employees, when duly authorized by the committee, shall have access to and the right to examine any books, documents, papers, or records of any executive service of the Government for the purpose of securing the information needed by the committee in the prosecution of its work.

This question of the reorganization of the executive departments is perennial. It is usually particularly acute in campaign years. It is a great deal as Mark Twain is alleged to have said about the weather, "Everybody talks about it all the time, but no one ever does anything about it."

I think it is safe to say that those who have considered and studied the question the most are in general agreement that the most effective way to bring about a reorganization of the executive departments is to give the President power to reorganize them by Executive orders. Every attempt over the years to do it by legislative action has failed. Logrolling, bickerings, jealousies, ambitions, prejudices, and play for party advantage combined have been powerful enough to block all legislative attempts at reorganization in the past, and there is no reason to believe that conditions in that respect will be any different in the future. The President is the only one who can do the job, and it takes a great deal of force of character and determination on his part to do it.

After the President's letter to the Speaker, which the gentleman from Alabama had read from the Clerk's desk, the Washington Star had an editorial which states the situation. I want to read it, or extracts from it. It starts out by quoting the first sentence of the letter of the President to the Speaker, as follows:

"Last October", the President writes, "I began holding some conversations with interested and informed persons concerning what appealed to me as the necessity of making a careful study of the organization of the executive branch of the Government."

Then the editorial continues:

President Theodore Roosevelt held similar conversations with interested and informed persons. President Taft's conversations with similarly interested and informed persons brought into being the Commission on Economy and Efficiency, which developed into the Bureau of Efficiency, now dead. Under President Harding, as the result of many conversations, there was created the Joint Congressional Committee on Government Reorganization, with Walter Brown as chairman.

President Coolidge transferred, by Executive order, the Bureau of Mines and the Patent Office from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Commerce. President Hoover, after extensive conversations and some work within the different departments, concluded that the only effective way to reorganize the executive branch of the Government was through Executive orders issued with the permission of Congress to go ahead and do what he thought best. President Roosevelt made several references during the campaign to the need for consolidations and reorganization in the Government service, and Congress granted him broad authority along such lines through the Economy Act. One of the results was the abolition of the Screw Thread Commission.

As Gratiano exclaimed in mockery to Shylock in the Merchant of Venice:

> A Daniel, still say I; a second Daniel!
> I thank thee for teaching me that name.

So might the writer of this editorial have exclaimed to the President, "Conversations, still say I; conversations! I thank thee for teaching me that name."

The Star editorial continues:

This year Senator BYRD, of Virginia, has been active in his demands that something be done about reorganization, and the Senate has just created a special committee and appointed advisory experts to look into the matter. Dr. Luther H. Gulick and Louis Brownlow were two of the five experts so chosen. The Byrd resolution was introduced February 24 and passed only a few days ago. But President Roosevelt, in his letter to the Vice President and the Speaker, says he began thinking about the same thing last October. So the President apparently has first claim to the idea, which entitles him to choose, as two members of his three-man commission, Dr. Luther H. Gulick and Louis Brownlow.

The President is anxious for the creation of a House committee that will work with his own commission and Senator BYRD's committee—all the reporting to be done to the next Congress, next January, after the election.

While the President's reorganization proposals are aimed specifically at examining the greatly enlarged executive establishment resulting from New Deal recovery activities and determining what temporary agencies can be abolished, merged with other agencies, or given a permanent status, all reorganization schemes finally come up against the same thing, namely, that the only reorganization which saves money is the reorganization that results in discharge of personnel. And the discharge of personnel always gives politicians a severe headache, for it hurts people back home.

I call attention particularly to the statements in the closing paragraph of the editorial:

The more committees and commissions involved in reorganization, the less chance there is for any effective reorganization. Neither House of Congress is willing to surrender its own prerogatives in matters relating to the public pay roll, and Congress is not willing to give the President the arbitrary authority he really needs. The latest reorganization plan will be watched with interest, but not with any great amount of confidence in the results.

It will be recalled that a joint committee on the reorganization of the executive departments of the Government was appointed early in the Harding administration and a representative of the President was made chairman of that committee. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], then a Member of the Senate, took an active part in the work of that committee as one of the Senate members of it. I was one of the House members.

That joint committee, after an extensive and exhaustive study, submitted a bill to reorganize the executive departments, which was introduced in both Houses of Congress. It is no secret to say that the Democratic leadership in both branches blocked the enactment of that bill into law, and the work of the committee went for naught.

Later, President Hoover was given authority to reorganize the departments, to reduce their number and eliminate overlapping and duplication, by Executive orders, but the law giving him that authority provided that such Executive orders should be transmitted to Congress, and that if either branch of Congress within 60 calendar days after their transmittal should pass a resolution disapproving them, they became null and void. In accordance with the authority granted him under the law, President Hoover transmitted to Congress on the 9th day of December 1932 a message containing a number of Executive orders reorganizing the departments upon an extensive scale, but the House of Representatives, controlled then as now by the Democratic Party, passed a resolution under date of January 19, 1933, disapproving all the Executive orders submitted by President Hoover at that time, thereby blocking the whole reorganization program, notwithstanding the loud protestation and promises of the President and the Democratic Party generally in the campaign which had just closed, for a thorough reorganization of the departments and a reduction of governmental expenditures.

The Economy Act of March 20, 1933, which was passed with such a blare of trumpets at the beginning of this administration, gave President Roosevelt full power to reorganize the executive departments by Executive order without restriction, without retaining in Congress the power to veto his action, such as was done in the case of President Hoover. President Roosevelt was required to act within 2 years from the passage of the Economy Act, as has been pointed out by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON], but no action under that authority was ever taken by him. Now, as another campaign approaches, we are asked to pass this resolution. No one expects anything to be accomplished by it before the election, but it will give an opportunity for Democratic spellbinders during the campaign to tell what they intend to do if they are continued in power. Its principal purpose no doubt is to give the administration an excuse for its failure to act and to hold more conversations during the coming campaign.

In the light of what has transpired during the last 3 years, it is interesting to read the plank in the Democratic platform of 1932 on this subject of the reorganization of the executive departments and the reduction of governmental expenses. Here it is:

The Democratic Party solemnly promises by appropriate action to put into effect the principles, policies, and reforms herein advocated, and to eradicate the policies, methods, and practices herein condemned. We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance, to accomplish a saving of not less than 25 percent in the cost of Federal Government, and we call upon the Democratic Party in the States to make a zealous effort to achieve a proportionate result.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman knows that when the Democratic administration came into power there were 61 major departments of the Government, and that they have established 41 new ones, after their promise to cut down 25 percent.

Mr. MAPES. Yes; expenses of the Government have multiplied, and bureaus have increased, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, in direct violation of the platform and campaign promises of the party in power. That is common knowledge.

Mr. Speaker, there is no one more in favor of doing away with duplication and waste in Government service than I am; and if I thought that this resolution would help at all to do away with it, I would support it most heartily. But, believing, as I do, that it will have the opposite effect, I shall vote against it. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

MY RECORD IN CONGRESS

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALLGREN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, this is the time of the year when we start casting our balances, checking up on the promises that we have made to those who elected us, and seeing how the record that we have made looks in the light of our campaign pledges.

I am going to ask your indulgence for a few minutes while I make a survey of my record as compared with what I told the voters of the Second Oklahoma District when I was campaigning for election.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS—SOLDIER BONUS

Old-age pensions and the soldier bonus were the two principal planks in my platform 2 years ago.

The first speech I made in Congress—on the opening day of the session on January 3, 1935—was in favor of payment of the soldier bonus. I kept working on this, along with the leaders of Congress and representatives of the service organizations, such as the American Legion and Veterans of Foreign Wars, until this year we succeeded in enacting this law.

I have received many letters from veterans in my district thanking me for this service, and saying they intend to use their bonus money to buy farms or small businesses, which will make them independent again.

I made numerous speeches upon the old-age-pension proposition, in Congress, in Oklahoma, Washington, and several other States and over the radio, and am glad to state that I voted for the first old-age-pension law ever passed by Congress, the Social Security Act, passed last year. I tried in vain to have this amended so that direct Federal payments would be made in all States, but am glad to say that now the Social Security Board is matching payments made to old persons in Oklahoma by the State welfare board as a result of this law, despite the fact that Oklahoma has no statute law providing for pensions.

THE FARMER

When I ran for Congress 2 years ago I carried every farming precinct in the district except two. I value the friendship of the farmers more than I can tell and have devoted a large portion of my time in Washington to consideration of their problems.

I said in my campaign speeches that I believed the main thing that the farmer should do was to conserve the moisture and the soil. I said I was in favor of flood control and, if possible, navigation of our streams, but that I believed that the most important thing was to prevent the enormous loss of fertile topsoil and precious water, especially needed in our section of the country. I pointed out also that these three problems could be solved together. Storing the water upon the farm would certainly cut down soil erosion and materially decrease loss from floods.

The first bill I introduced in Congress was to provide for the creation of the Soil Conservation Service as a permanent agency of government. This was passed and the Soil Conservation Service is now the key agency of the Nation's farm-relief set-up. Farmers are to receive payments this year for cooperation in soil conservation. They are to receive the help of the Federal Government in protecting their land.

REDISTRIBUTION OF WEALTH

I said when I ran for Congress 2 years ago that I favored a more equitable distribution of wealth and that it was my opinion that this would have to be brought about by a revision of the tax system to break up big fortunes. When I outlined my program over the district some of my listeners termed me as a "wild-eyed radical."

But at the last session of Congress President Roosevelt called for an increase in the income-tax and inheritance-tax rates upon the very rich, which was a part of my program. I was glad to vote for this and am glad to say that the bill was passed.

However, too many millionaires escaped payment of their income taxes by diverting their money into private companies, where it was held as "undivided earnings" of the company, and therefore not subject to income taxes. By this means, some of our wealthiest men kept increasing their wealth without paying taxes. So this year we are tightening up by providing that undistributed earnings of corporations will be subject to tax.

The new corporation tax bill will be chiefly felt by the private corporations set up especially to avoid taxes, and the 200 biggest corporations of our country control more than half the assets of all the 257,000 corporations of the country. It is believed that the new plan will decrease the amount of taxes to be paid by 214,000 corporations with less than $10,000 earnings a year.

I am in favor of taking care of the little fellows; the big boys can take care of themselves.

I am also a member of the executive committee formed to bring about passage of the equal opportunity in business bill—the Patman-Robinson bill—which would outlaw secret rebates and other unfair advantages to the big chain-store and mail-order systems.

EDUCATION

I promised if elected that I would make my appointments to the United States Military Academy at West Point and the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis upon a merit—not a political—basis and give all the boys in the district an opportunity to obtain one of these appointments.

This has been done. I have made three appointments. Boys in Okmulgee, Henryetta, and Muldrow have been named to vacancies. One in Muskogee is next in line. Three of these boys are the sons of widows. All were victorious in district-wide elimination contests conducted for me by the State superintendent of schools.

I have boosted the National Youth Administration and am glad to say that I have been promised that this agency to assist in the education of our young people will be continued.

Incidentally I was able to be of service to most of the common schools in my district by blocking a plan to reduce the payments made for tuition of Indian children by the Federal Government. These funds are an important part of the finances of a big part of the schools in my district.

MONEY

I said 2 years ago that I favored an expansion of our currency. I still do. I favored the Patman plan for paying the soldier bonus without a bond issue. I favor the Frazier-Lemke bill for putting the credit of the Federal Government behind the American farmer.

I regret to say that our currency has been expanded only slightly. We still have metallic reserves of gold and silver in our Treasury vaults in excess of $5,000,000,000, against which there is not one dollar of money in circulation. Against this we could issue currency to the amount of $5,000,000,000 in excess of that which is now in circulation and still have 100 cents on the dollar of metallic reserve behind all of our circulating currency. This would not be inflation. Inflation means issuance of money backed by air or nothing.

Our dollar is still too high. It is worth $1.30, roughly, as against the ideal of $1 of 100 cents, as prevailed in 1926. Until we get our dollar back to 100 cents our farmers and those who are in debt and must repay obligations will be fighting an uphill battle, and will give up $1.30 worth of their crops and labor to secure a dollar in currency.

LABOR

I said in my campaign that I would favor those measures supported by organized labor. I have done so. I am glad to report to my colleagues that the members of organized labor in my district, as over the entire Nation, recognize the fact that the Democratic administration has done more for the workingman than any administration since that of Woodrow Wilson and that practically 100 percent of the members will vote Democratic in November.

RECOGNITION

Coming to Congress for a first term, I was elected vice president of the New Members' Club, composed of the 100 first-termers, last year. I have enjoyed working with these freshmen Congressmen very much and have formed many warm friendships which I know will last through the years.

I have obtained the cooperation of the departments in Washington and was successful in bringing five C. C. C. camps to the district, as well as two soil-conservation service demonstrational areas. I was able to get the first hospital for members of the Five Civilized Tribes ever erected in my district. I brought one of the two Resettlement Administration projects in the State to my district.

When it became known that an order had been issued for the closing of 700 out of the 2,158 C. C. C. camps in the Nation, including 2 in my district, I was chosen chairman of the group in the House which opposed this and brought about a new order to keep all camps open. I have in my files letters from more than 100 Congressmen thanking me for my leadership in this fight.

I have been selected by the Democratic National Committee to make speeches on behalf of the party in doubtful States and have made more than 20 such speeches already. I will make as many more as I can.

My work on the important Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House of Representatives has won me recognition by, and a place on, the board of directors of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, and at the thirty-first annual convention of this organization, recently assembled in Washington, I was elected national vice president of the organization and made chairman of its finance committee.

I was, on April 29, selected as one of a commission of nine to select an airport for the Nation's Capital. Three of these members were appointed by the President of the United States, three by the Vice President, and three by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

CONCLUSION

Coming to Congress as a country boy serving his first term, I was more or less worried as to whether or not I would fit into the congressional picture and the scheme of things here. I am told, Mr. Speaker, by many of the leaders of the House that my accomplishments here have been remarkable for a new Member of Congress. These statements have made me very happy; and if I have had some success, I want to take this opportunity of thanking the Speaker of the House and the other leaders of the House of Representatives for their very kind treatment given me, and to assure you that without their cooperation and their kind guidance that my record would not be nearly so imposing as it is.

I believe that the leaders of public opinion, and the people generally in my district, know that I have tirelessly worked at my job, fighting for their best interests, and are satisfied with my record. I am a candidate for reelection. Several others have also filed, but I wish to assure you, Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, that I will be in your midst again during the next session of Congress ready and willing to take my place on the battle front to complete the job which was started at the outset of this administration. [Applause.]

I have not been able to find jobs for everyone that wanted them. Sentiment for me is not unanimous. I do not expect it to be. However, I would appreciate it very much and really expect to receive enough votes in the first primary on July 7 so that a run-off will not be necessary. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON].

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, the resolution under consideration ,contemplates a reduction in the expenses of government. I know of no more important, and, at the same time, more difficult problem.

Many efforts have been made to coordinate and abolish executive agencies but few have succeeded.

Reference has been made to the work of a joint investigating committee of Congress, to their recommendations, and to the fact that they were not adopted. Merely transferring functions from one agency to another does not result in economy. There can be no real reduction in governmental expenditures unless overlapping is abolished and unless personnel is eliminated.

Again, it has been said that the Senate has appointed a committee and that there should be a joint committee. Such a committee is not essential. The Senate and the House are coordinate branches of the legislative department. Each branch has its committees. In order to function they must cooperate. The House has its Committee on Appropriations. That committee conducts its hearings. The Senate has its Committee on Appropriations. There is no duplication in the hearings. The hearings before one committee are available to the other. It is necessary for the committee of the two houses on all legislation to cooperate. It is expected that the committee provided by the pending legislation will cooperate with a similar committee in the Senate. There should be no duplication of expenditures by the committees. I feel sure that joint hearings can be arranged; moreover, I believe that there will be cooperation between the representatives of the Executive, the Senate, and the House.

EXECUTIVE AUTHORITY

Public Act 212, approved June 30, 1932, eliminated certain agencies, consolidated others, and provided for regroupings. In addition, it authorized the President to regroup, consolidate, and abolish.

President Hoover, defeated for reelection in November 1932 by Franklin D. Roosevelt, transmitted a message on December 9, 1932, providing for regrouping. He submitted substantially no facts and gave no reasons for the proposed Executive orders. He did transmit as a part of his message a discussion prepared by the Director of the Budget. Col. J. C. Roop was the Director of the Budget at the time, and he prepared the Executive orders.

Under the act of June 30, 1932, the Executive orders of the President became effective unless either the House or Senate within 60 days rejected the orders. They were referred to the Committee on Executive Expenditures in the House; hearings were conducted; the Director of the Budget appeared and very frankly stated that in his opinion no substantial economies would result from the so-called consolidations; that it was impossible to determine what amount, if any, could be saved; and in conclusion he stated that in his opinion it would be unwise for the Executive orders to become effective on the eve of the inauguration of a new President. It appeared that the Executive orders effected no economies, but merely left to the executive agencies the matter of reducing personnel.

There were fundamental objections to several of the orders. It was provided that the General Accounting Office was to be transferred to the Bureau of the Budget. Aside from being wholly undesirable, it was exceedingly doubtful whether or not under the law the President had the right to make this transfer. The Accounting Office is not an executive office; it was not created by Executive order; it was provided for by an act of Congress.

Again, the United States Employees' Compensation Commission was not abolished, but its functions would have been divided between the Department of Labor and the Civil Service Commission. There would have been an increase in expenditures rather than a reduction.

It was universally conceded that the consolidations merely provided for the transfer from one agency to another and that no substantial economies would result.

There were other fundamental objections to the orders. The work of flood control was to be transferred to the Department of the Interior. Colonel Roop, the Director of the Budget, admitted that there was an oversight in not providing that the work was to be done under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers of the Army.

Moreover, it appeared that the powers of the Executive, to be effective, should be broadened. Under the act the President was not vested with broad enough power to enable the Executive to redistribute functions, make eliminations, prevent duplications, and thus reduce expenses.

I am now, and was at the time, a member of the Committee on Expenditures. I have given much time and a great deal of study to economy in the administration of government. I am familiar with the efforts that have been made to prevent overlapping and to eliminate duplications. It was apparent that the Executive orders submitted by President Hoover were hastily and carelessly drawn. My remarks are to be found in the RECORD of Thursday, January 19, 1933, page 2183. The Director of the Budget stated that he thought it would be unwise for Congress to approve the consolidations recommended by President Herbert Hoover; he felt that the President who made the economies and under whose administration the eliminations must occur should have a voice in the Executive orders. Thereupon the committee reported and the House adopted a resolution disapproving the consolidations recommended by President Herbert Hoover, and thereby adopted the view of President Hoover's Director of the Budget, who frankly stated substantially:

Personally, I think it would be wise not to approve the consolidations recommended by President Hoover.

Subsequently on March 3, 1933, certain reorganizations of the executive departments were made. Congress approved the elimination of certain agencies and the consolidation of others. The Executive was given more plenary power in Public Act 428, which was the annual appropriation for the Post Office and Treasury Departments for the fiscal year 1934, in the act approved March 3, 1933.

Again, in the Economy Act approved March 20, 1933, sections 407 and 409 were amended, section 409 providing that all Executive orders providing for regrouping should be transmitted within 2 years from the date of the act which was March 20, 1933.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] made the statement that the President had the power to consolidate and regroup. He is in error. The power expired on March 20, 1935; he is without power to eliminate and to regroup without authority of Congress.

Again, the distinguished minority leader [Mr. SNELL] made the statement that, while the President had the power to regroup and to eliminate, he took no action. The fact is that he made substantial coordinations, reductions, and eliminations.

Congress provided for certain economies and reductions in the Economy Act, to which I have referred. The Executive was given power to make many others. During the 2 years that the President had the power to coordinate, regroup, eliminate, and abolish, he transmitted 17 Executive orders to Congress, all of which were approved.

SEVENTEEN EXECUTIVE ORDERS BY PRESIDENT FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

Under the leave to revise and extend my remarks, I include the 17 Executive orders issued by President Roosevelt before the expiration of the 2 years and under the authority given to the Executive by Congress, as follows, to wit:

SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

June 10, 1933, House Document No. 69: Procurement; national parks, buildings, and reservations; investigations; disbursements; claims; insular courts; solicitors; internal revenue; Assistant Secretary of Commerce; Official Register; statistics of cities; Shipping Board; National Screw Thread Commission; immigration and naturalization; vocational education; apportionment of appropriations; coordinating service; general provisions; appropriations.

SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

SEVENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

February 8, 1935, House Document No. 97: Veterans.

March 19, 1935, House Document No. 141: Veterans.

Probably the outstanding of all the orders was the order of June 10, 1933, providing for the establishment of the Procurement Division, that has resulted in the saving of millions of dollars to the Government; for consolidating the national parks, buildings, and reservations; for investigations in the Department of Justice; for the establishment of the chief disbursing officer; for the abolition of the Federal Coordinating Service; for the consolidation of the Bureaus of Immigration and Naturalization; and for the transfer of the Shipping Board to the Department of Commerce.

As I stated in the beginning, economy in Government means the elimination of personnel. It is difficult for the Executive; it is most difficult for Congress. As a result, bureaucracy has multiplied; there are many overlappings; there are many duplications; there is much extravagance.

Congress approved the 17 Executive orders issued by President Franklin D. Roosevelt. In the emergency, additional executive agencies have been established; but Congress cannot escape responsibility by saying that the Executive should reduce and economize. The record speaks for itself. President Franklin D. Roosevelt, under the authority that was conferred upon him for 2 years, which expired more than a year ago, effected more regroupings, coordinations, and proper transfers, and made more eliminations than Congress had made since the World War; moreover, President Franklin D. Roosevelt, in the greatest emergency that our country has ever known, while waging vigorously the campaign against the depression, is the only President that has effected any regroupings by reducing and coordinating during the past 16 years.

It is now time to correlate the emergency agencies with existing agencies. Recovery is returning. The Committee on Expenditures gave careful consideration to coordinating and reduction in the expenses of Government during the past session. It has been in touch and in contact with those interested in promoting reductions in the Senate.

Independent action by either branch will not accomplish the desired results. It is evident that neither the committee nor any select committee by the House can accomplish the desired results without cooperation with the Senate and with the Executive.

Personally I am inclined to the view that a joint resolution would have passed the Senate if it had been practical. In the circumstances the best resolution that could be passed was obtained. The usual system will prevail. The usual rule is for the House to appoint its own committee. I repeat that experience and study have demonstrated that the best way to promote economy in Government is for the legislative branch to vest the authority in the Chief Executive. The functions of government have expanded; careful studies and investigations are required. The resolution provides for cooperation between the President, the Senate, and the House. It is timely and should be adopted.

Personally a joint committee might have been more desirable, but practically the same results can be obtained. If the purpose be to economize, eliminate, and reduce the expenditures of Government, there will be no difficulty about separate committees; they will both cooperate with each other and with the Executive. There must be economy, efficiency, and simplification in the Federal Government. The adoption of the proposed resolution is a necessary and important step in the solution of the problem.

There is need for fostering and crystallizing public opinion that will demand a reduction of expenses of the Government. Careful studies, impartial investigation, and courageous committees can render the Congress and the country a great service.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. In just a moment, if I have the time, I will be glad to yield.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the view that generally the best way to eliminate and to reduce is to give the Executive the power and the Congress the right to approve or disapprove, because, I repeat, it is most difficult either for the Executive or for Congress to reduce, because to reduce means to eliminate. It means to cut down expenses. It means that somebody must lose his position. I repeat that this resolution contemplates cooperation with the committee appointed by the Senate and with the committee already announced by the Executive, because there can be no savings of expenditures in the Government unless the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives agree. Personally I believe the Senate would have adopted a joint resolution, but there evidently was difficulty in securing the resolution that was adopted.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I would be glad to, but my time has expired.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman did not want to yield. I wanted him to show where there was any saving.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. The gentleman is in error about that. I had only 5 minutes and my time has expired, otherwise I would gladly yield.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, this is an important resolution. We have heard the history of previous attempts to consolidate the departments. Several committees have been set up. Reports have been made, as here stated. The purpose of this resolution is most laudable, but as a practical matter, is this the course to pursue? The Senate has already set up the Byrd committee, which is functioning. We all know Senator BYRD. We know his views on consolidation, and it seems to me that we have no right at this time to question the sincerity of the efforts being made by the Byrd committee. Since the Byrd committee is functioning, and the President, we are told today, has created another committee, which is going to function along the same lines, this resolution now provides for the setting up of another or third select committee to do exactly the same thing. The majority leader [Mr. BANKHEAD] tells us that it is hoped and presumed that those committees will synchronize, that they will work together, that they will aim at the same objectives, but there is a way to make that thing sure. If that is what we want to do, let us adopt the resolution suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], which is now pending before the Congress, and set up this joint committee, which must synchronize, which must consider and act together, and which must report back to the several agencies creating it.

Where is the committee, whichever committee you refer to, going to get its information? It is going to get it from the departments, from the executive branches, and exactly the same information, if it is of any value, must be presented to each of the three committees. We all know what an investigation of this kind means to the departments. We know the extra expense to the departments; we know that men must be detailed by the departments to make studies and to appear before the committees and give evidence. That all takes time, it takes personnel, it is expensive. Is this sensible House going to require these departments to go through three different procedures, to give the three different bodies the same information? Oh, it is easy to suggest, as was just suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON], that it is presumed that these committees will all work together. I have been informed within the last 10 minutes that the head of the Senate committee has advised one of the House Members on the Committee on Expenditures that anybody from the House who wants to can sit in at their hearings, but that whoever does will have no official position or standing there. If that is true, then that absolutely does away with every suggestion or presumption of coordination that might have been made here.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Not now. So that the thing for us to do here is to turn down another committee or commission. As a matter of fact, we are attempting to eliminate, and at the same time are setting up three committees, each of which is to do the same thing. In the name of economy, efficiency, and common sense let us not create another overlapping, duplicating, and money-spending agency.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, it is rather difficult to follow the opposition to this resolution. The gentleman who last spoke, the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], said that the purpose of the resolution is "laudable." The other distinguished Member from Michigan, among the many distinguished Members from that Democratic State [Mr. MAPES], has introduced a resolution to accomplish the very same purpose. The distinguished minority leader [Mr. SNELL] did not attack the purpose of the resolution. His only complaint was that three committees were being set up to accomplish an identical purpose. Of course, the answer to all this is that we are in an election year. Our opponents want to preserve what they think is some ammunition against us. We have heard in this House and we have read in the press and we have heard over the radio about the great multiplication of bureaus and commissions. It is even alleged that we have outdone Mr. Hoover in creating bureaus and commissions, and that is some contrast. I fear that even the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], who has complained about the multiplication or triplication of bureaus by 41 or more, is going to vote against this resolution, which we present as a sincere attempt to make an effort to reorganize the Government and reduce the number of departments, boards, bureaus, commissions, and possibly the personnel of the Government.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. For a brief question.

Mr. RICH. If I knew that this is an honest and sincere effort to do that, God knows that I would be for it; but I am afraid you are going to do what you have been doing, boondoggling and fooling the public. If the gentleman gives us any assurance that they are not going to fool us, I will vote for it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, the gentleman is not going to vote for it, and no Member of his party is going to vote for it, because they want to preserve the status quo until after November. That is obvious to the people of this country as well as it is to us.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. The last economy investigation that we had was in 1932. The House did everything but strike out the enacting clause to the bill which that committee brought in. That committee, a very distinguished committee, was appointed and did not ask for any appropriation, nor did they get aid to carry out the investigation. Is it contemplated that this committee is going to come in and ask for funds to carry on this investigation?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have heard no indication about that whatsoever. I have never heard it intimated that funds were going to be requested. Perhaps this committee could operate without special funds. I do not know.

The distinguished minority leader was content, if I follow the logic of his argument, to leave the reorganization of the Government to a Senate committee, the so-called Byrd committee, as though this House, of which he is such an outstanding Member, had nothing to do with it. Any reorganization of this Government must come to Congress, irrespective of the President's special committee. It may come to the House in the first instance, but it surely has to come here in any instance, irrespective of what any Senate committee may recommend.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. RICH. If the chairman of the Committee on Rules would cooperate with the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], who tried to persuade the Senate to appoint a joint committee, some results would really be obtained. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] is sincere, I believe, in trying to get these committees together, and if the gentleman would use his efforts, too, I believe we could accomplish the results desired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The majority members of the committees of the House always do cooperate, and that is what annoys the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is a paradox to me that the party out of power, while complaining about waste, extravagance, increasing personnel, increasing bureaus and agencies, always opposes any reduction until after the election, because if they did, we steal their thunder. This will be evidenced here today by a united vote on the minority side against this resolution.

Our distinguished majority leader said that the carrying out of the purposes of this resolution would be a courageous effort. I agree with him in this statement. This committee should necessarily be composed only of courageous men and women. I do not know why anybody should seek membership on the committee, because they will have to stand against all the threats of Federal employees, all the threats of this bureau or that department, all the persuasions of the beneficiaries of these bureaus, just as was experienced by the members of the Economy Committee. A member of this committee has got to be a courageous statesman who will yield to no bloc, to no group, and to no beneficiary of the Federal Government. If I were Dr. EATON, of New Jersey, I might well say, "The Lord have mercy on their souls." [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WOODRUM). The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the passage of the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SNELL) there were—ayes 120, noes 32.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Obviously there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 269, nays 44, answered "present" 1, not voting 113, as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise the remarks I made on the resolution just adopted, and to include in the extension the copy of the resolution which I introduced and the balance of the editorial in the Washington Star from which I read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we on both sides have followed the uniform practice of objecting to editorials. I shall not object to the other part of the gentleman's request, but I hope he will withdraw that portion relating to the editorial.

Mr. MAPES. I read during the debate very extensively from the editorial. I am asking only to complete the editorial.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman did read extensively from it in his remarks?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under these circumstances, I shall not object.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent that the consent of the gentleman from Michigan may be granted and that I may have permission to extend my remarks and to include therein two or three short statements about the Florida canal.

The SPEAKER. It is impossible to connect two requests.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein two or three short statements, including one or two editorials—very short—on the Florida canal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include therein two or three short statements and also two or three short editorials. Is there objection?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does not the gentleman think that the Florida canal has cost enough already?

Mr. GREEN. This will not take more than a page or two.

Mr. KNUTSON. How much does a page cost?

Mr. GREEN. Ask your colleague from Michigan. The House just gave him permission. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. KNUTSON. That would be another $100 thrown into the canal.

Mr. GREEN. No; it will not be.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, inasmuch as the gentleman from Florida has referred to me twice in connection with his unanimous-consent request, and in view of the statement that he made the other day, I desire to make a brief statement.

It is unusual for a Member of the House to take the position which the gentleman from Florida took at that time. He secured unanimous consent to proceed for a minute, and in that minute criticized the position of another Member and then objected to a request of another Member for time in which to reply. However, I shall not return the compliment in kind, and will not object to the gentleman's extension.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how much of the RECORD is the gentleman going to use? I want to call attention to the fact that when he asked to revise and extend his remarks on the day to which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] refers, he used 4, 5, 6 or 8 pages of the RECORD.

Mr. GREEN. I did not put in the article to which objection was made. This will only take about a page or two. The statement made recently, and referred to by the gentleman, took, I believe, 1 or 2 pages.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman has a whole lot more in there. He stated it would be less than a page. How much is he going to put in today about the Florida canal?

Mr. GREEN. A page or two, I think.

Mr. RICH. Will it be more than one page? It will not be 6 or 8 pages like last week?

Mr. GREEN. Oh, no; it will not be 6 or 8 pages.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I will have to object unless I may be allowed to make a statement.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the demand for a moment.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the situation Friday, to which I was referring, was this: An objection had been made to the request of the gentleman from Florida to speak out of order in the Committee of the Whole. I did not initiate the objection to his proceeding out of order, but someone did, and very properly so. The point was made that the Committee of the Whole could not grant the permission which the gentleman requested. It was in compliance with the regular and orderly procedure of the House. The gentleman saw fit, when the Committee rose, to indulge in a criticism of a Member for raising the point of order.

Mr. GREEN. But that had to do with another gentleman from Michigan, who made the point of order, and I might say also that on that day many Members had spoken out of order.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman from Florida obtained consent to proceed for 1 minute, and then objected to any answer being made to his statement. However, as I have said, I shall not reply in kind, and, as far as I am concerned, I shall not object to the gentleman's request to extend his remarks as indicated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I have been requested to announce that the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. JOHNSON, is absent on account of illness, and that if present he would have voted "yea" on the resolution which has just been passed.

THE REPUBLICAN OUTLOOK

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the National Broadcasting Co. network, Tuesday evening, April 28, at 6:45 o'clock:

My remarks will be addressed this evening to the radio audience on the state of the Republican Party. Candor requires me to speak the truth, no matter how unpleasant it may be.

The rank and file of the people have already made up their minds that they will not support any Republican candidate who has the blessings of the American Liberty League, the reactionary political manipulators of the smoke-filled room variety that prefer to gang up on Senator BORAH because they cannot control him, than to win with him.

These wreckers of the party prefer to go down to defeat with some second- or third-rate candidate in order to rule the wreck afterward. But even such a selfish policy of defeatism will get them nowhere, as there will be no party to rule in case of another political disaster.

The Republican Party and the country face a crisis more alarming than anything since the Civil War. The time has come to speak boldly and not to mince words or to use weasel words, but to present the facts and let the chips fall where they may.

I have only one interest in expressing my political views and concern while there is yet time, and that is for the best interests and success of the Republican Party and the preservation of our representative and constitutional government and the restoration of a government by law instead of bureaucracy, Executive orders, and "brain trust" edicts. No matter what Republican candidate is nominated for President, I propose to support him to the best of my ability.

The fact is the people are determined that no Wall Street candidate backed by the American Liberty League, public utilities, or oil interests shall be elected President. There is only one way to disabuse their minds and get them to support the Republican Party, and that is to nominate an outstanding liberal whom the people know is controlled by no interests and has a long record as a champion of the rights and liberties of the people and a square deal for American farmers and wage earners.

If the combination of the big campaign contributors and reactionary political leaders, representing selfish interests, do not see the handwriting on the wall before the Cleveland convention, then it will be too late to save the Republican Party.

None are so blind as those who refuse to see; none so deaf as those who plug their ears to facts; none so stupid as those who will not learn until they have been knocked senseless by public opinion and the ballots of a free people.

I am convinced that Senator BORAH is the only Republican who can defeat Roosevelt and bring back into the Republican Party the liberal elements, the wage earners, and the farmers, who have left it in recent years, and whose support is necessary to win. The subject of my remarks, The Republican Outlook, can be summed up in a few words. Nominate Senator BORAH and we will win. That is my honest conviction, and no one, whether he or she agrees or disagrees with me, will, I am sure, question my sincerity or my motives. I have spoken in 40 States within the last year and believe I know what the people are thinking about back home. I am completely convinced that no other Republican in this political crisis except Senator BORAH can be elected, and I regard it as my duty to my party and to the people to state the reasons without evasions or pussyfooting. I propose to state exactly why I am convinced that a vote for Senator BORAH is for Republican success and victory in November, and that a vote against him or for some other candidate means disaster and defeat for the party, and, generally speaking, for our candidates for Governor, United States Senator, Congressmen, and State and local Republican candidates down to constable.

As Al Smith says, let's look at the record:

(1) Senator BORAH is the only outstanding statesman in our party whose name is known throughout the Nation and the world.

(2) He is the only candidate, if Herbert Hoover is excepted, who knows great national and international issues from actual experience.

(3) He is recognized as the greatest orator in the Republican Party, and the only one who can meet President Roosevelt and turn his sugar-coated phrases and honey-coated words into kindergarten efforts.

(4) He more nearly represents the principles and policies of Abraham Lincoln and the square deal of Theodore Roosevelt than any Republican in public life.

(5) For a quarter of a century in the Senate of the United States he has championed the rights and interests of the farmers and wage earners and led the fight for social and industrial justice. He has the support of both the Grange and of labor. He was the author of the bill creating the Department of Labor and also of the Children's Bureau.

(6) He is the foremost expounder and supporter of the Constitution and the powers of the Supreme Court in the United States and for the preservation of our representative and constitutional government.

(7) He stands squarely against economic and political dictatorship and "expensive, demoralizing, devastating, and destructive bureaucracy." Referring to the crushing bureaucracy under the New Deal, he said: "It has destroyed every civilization upon which it has fastened its lecherous grip."

(8) He is the outstanding leader in the fight against monopoly and to preserve economic independence for the grocer, butcher, baker, druggist, and small businessman.

(9) He is opposed to the reciprocal-trade treaties and urges the protection of the American market for the American farmer and wage earner. Here he differs vitally with President Roosevelt, who favors a reduction in the tariff. Senator BORAH stated recently that the present policy of letting in foreign farm produce makes it impossible for the farmer to maintain a decent standard of wages or even save his farm. Senator BORAH stands squarely against the importation of the products of foreign papuerized labor.

He voted against the N. R. A. as being unconstitutional; and that was 50 percent of the New Deal, as it destroyed business confidence and put business in a straight jacket and actually retarded recovery. The improvement of business conditions dates from the time the Supreme Court held the N. R. A. unconstitutional. He also voted against such unconstitutional measures as the Bankhead Cotton Control Act, Guffey coal bill, the bargaining tariffs, and antilynching bill. He even refused to support the potato control bill, which his own State of Idaho favored, on constitutional grounds.

(11) He has a tremendous appeal among Jeffersonian Democrats and great racial groups, such as Germans, Irish, Italians, and Jews in the industrial centers, because of his record as chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

(12) He led the successful fight against the League of Nations, Versailles Treaty, World Court, and other forms of entangling alliances, including the recent effort of the New Deal to give the President power to lay economic sanctions which would have involved us in European blood feuds and boundary disputes. He believes that if the old nations of the world arm to the teeth and go to war, that it is their war and not ours and that we should mind our own business and stay out of it.

These are 12 sound and compelling reasons why the voters of Ohio, South Dakota, West Virginia, and New Jersey should mark a cross before the name of WILLIAM E. BORAH in their respective primaries. But there are other and more vital and important political reasons.

He is the only Republican who can carry the Northwestern States of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, North and South Dakota, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, without which no Republican can be elected President. These are, at heart, Republican States and would come back to the party if BORAH is nominated, and would likewise elect Republican Members of Congress. We have to have these States, or most of them, to win, and are not so much concerned with States like Missouri and Kentucky, presumably Democratic, whose delegates are for Landon.

Unless we regain the Republican States in the Northwest we might just as well give the election to Roosevelt without a fight. I am also convinced that in New York State, which is not only doubtful but in recent years strongly Democratic, that Senator BORAH would poll a quarter of a million more votes in New York City than any other Republican. He has a tremendous following among the people of German origin on account of his opposition to the Versailles Treaty and the confiscation of German and Austrian property after the war. The Italian element are back of him, as he stopped President Roosevelt from getting power to place economic sanctions against the Italian people. He has a big following among the Irish because of his plea for religious liberty and freedom of worship. He is popular with the Jewish element because of his advocacy of zionism and the establishment of a homeland for the Jews in Palestine and because, as a liberal, he is opposed to all forms of religious or racial intolerance and persecution.

If the people of Ohio and other primary States express their preference for Senator BORAH for President, it will mean his nomination and election in November; but if they fail to support him it can only mean the election of President Roosevelt and the retention of the squandermania and political and economic dictatorship of the New Deal.

The radio audience may ask why I am so worried about the outlook for a Republican success and point to the Literary Digest poll. My answer to that is that the Literary Digest poll was for or against the New Deal, and everyone is against some measures of the New Deal, including most Democrats. However, when it comes to a vote for President Roosevelt against some unknown and inexperienced Republican who has never lived in Washington or held a Federal office, that is an entirely different proposition.

The recent enrollment in California should open the eyes of the reactionary politicians and big business interests as it shows in that hitherto Republican State there were 1,400,000 Democrats and only 900,000 Republicans, and the enrollment for the city of Pittsburgh likewise announced a few weeks ago, and also a big Republican city in the past, discloses a majority for the Democrats for the first time since the Civil War. These figures do not lie. They can only mean that the people have lost faith in the "Old Guard" leadership of the Republican Party and will not support any candidate nominated by them or by wealth or reaction.

Some 25 Democratic Members of Congress have voluntarily told me that BORAH was the only Republican who could win, and that he had a tremendous appeal for Jeffersonian Democrats. Included among these Democrats were Irish Catholics and Jewish Congressmen from New York, Ku Kluxers from Texas, and western Democratic Members. Most of them admitted that BORAH is the only one who can win, while others said they thought he might win, and a few that he could get most votes, but that even he could not defeat Roosevelt, but all agreed he was by far the strongest Republican candidate that could be nominated and the only one the Democrats feared. Former United States Senator James Reed, of Missouri, a life-long Democrat, told me that if the Republicans nominated Senator BORAH he would take his coat off and speak for him in every State BORAH wanted. Senator Reed merely expresses the sentiment of millions of Jeffersonian Democrats. A great many in New York have said to me, "if your party nominates BORAH, we will work and vote for him. We dislike—a mild term—Roosevelt, but if you fail to nominate BORAH, we will continue to vote the Democratic ticket."

On his record, Senator BORAH is entitled to the support of labor, including the railroad men, post-office employees, and all civil-service employees throughout the country. He put through the 8-hour law on public works and was the author of the bill to investigate the 12-hour-per-day and 7-day-per-week conditions in the steel mills. He supported the anti-injunction and collective-bargaining bill, railroad retirement and pension acts, post-office salary restoration, and voted to give $30 a month to the helpless aged, and offered an amendment to increase this amount when the bill was in the Senate.

In answer to those who say that Senator BORAH is too old, I would point out that Gladstone in England, Clemenceau in France, Hindenburg in Germany, and Masyrick in Czechoslovakia, the greatest leaders in those countries, were 10 or more years older at the peak of their careers. For second choice, as a compromise candidate, if Senator BORAH is blocked by the Old Guard at the Cleveland convention, I would favor the nomination of Frank O. Lowden, former Governor of Illinois, who is 5 or 6 years older than Senator BORAH.

In 15 minutes it is not possible to do justice to the great public record of Senator BORAH to the people of the United States. I suggest that all who are interested in securing further information should read the article by Walter Lippmann on BORAH and sound liberalism and another by Senator BORAH himself in this week's issue of Liberty magazine.

No matter what our views are, we must put aside our personal preference to nominate a candidate who can win. The Republicans must not commit political suicide because of personal dislikes, prejudices, or animosities. In war the main objective is success in battle, so in this crisis the Republicans must make every concession to be victorious in order to elect a Republican President and Congress. It is not a question of what candidate you may prefer but what candidate can win. Senator BORAH is the only Republican, in my opinion, who can oust Roosevelt and the New Dealers and restore constitutional and representative government.

AMENDMENT OF WAR MINERALS RELIEF ACT

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 487 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

House Resolution 487

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 1432, an act to amend section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919, generally known as the War Minerals Relief Statutes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Mines and Mining, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the ranking minority member of the Rules Committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY].

Mr. Speaker, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, this matter came up in the last session of Congress under a rule, and on an automatic roll call in connection with a point of no quorum the rule was voted down.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. May I say to my colleague that the taking of the right position in connection with this resolution depends very largely upon a correct understanding of the question involved. The gentleman who is now addressing the House is very conversant with this matter, and I trust he may have good attention.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I think the reason the rule was voted down last year was due to the fact the membership was not familiar with what the bill did, and, having to vote quickly, they did as I have done frequently, they voted "no" because they did not know what was in the bill.

When America entered the World War in 1917 we found that we had a shortage in the production of pyrites, tungsten, chrome, and manganese, which were minerals very essential to carrying on the war. We needed all of the shipping facilities which were being used to import these minerals to carry supplies and troops to France. Therefore, Secretary of the Interior Lane, through the Geological Survey, the Bureau of Mines, and the State geologists throughout the Nation, asked people who owned mineral deposits of these types to open up these deposits and produce these minerals for the benefit of our Nation in the emergency. They were assured by the Secretary of the Interior that they would be protected from loss and that he would seek legislation to enable the Government to carry out its promise.

The Secretary of the Interior did seek that legislation, and in October 1918 the original act was passed. However, the war ended within a few weeks, thereafter, and the Attorney General then ruled that since the bill giving the President the right to take over these mineral projects was for the purpose of prosecuting the war, which had ended, the Secretary of the Interior was advised not to operate under the act. Then Congress on March 2, 1919, passed what is now generally referred to as the War Minerals Act. Section 5 is the pertinent section of that act which we are dealing with at this time.

Whereas the 1918 act had provided for just compensation and had given the claimants the right to go into court and sue the Government in the Court of Claims, the act of March 2, 1919, provided for the payment of net losses and specifically said there should not be any collection of profits. It was necessary for the claimants to show that they had been requested by the Secretary of the Interior, or other named Government agencies, to go into the production of these minerals.

In the cases dealt with by the bill which we are seeking to bring up here today, all questions have been settled with the sole exception of the question of interest which was lost on money borrowed. It is not interest on the claim, and I hope you will keep this distinction in mind, but interest which became a part of the net losses on money borrowed and lost during the war period.

The Secretary of the Interior, beginning in 1919 and coming on down to 1931, consistently held that no interest could be paid as a part of net losses. Finally, in 1929, the Congress amended the act of 1919 and gave these claimants the right to go into the courts and have the law construed, still leaving the Secretary of the Interior as the sole judge of the facts. When they went into the courts on this question of interest, the District Supreme Court first held they were not entitled to the interest. The court of appeals overruled that decision, and the Supreme Court of the United States upheld it and said that the Secretary of the Interior for 14 years had wrongfully construed this act and wrongfully withheld from these claimants the interest on money borrowed and lost during the war period.

Now, you must bear in mind that these people had continued to pay the interest for a period of 14 years after Congress had said they should be paid their net losses, and the only thing this bill proposes to do, Mr. Speaker, is to construe the act of Congress of March 1919 to mean that they shall be paid the interest which they actually incurred and paid up to the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Cannot the Court of Claims pass on this question?

Mr. RAMSPECK. No; they cannot, because under the present decision of the Supreme Court they have upheld the contention of the Secretary of the Interior that the act of March 2, 1919, constituted a cut-off date, and therefore he is not entitled to pay any interest beyond that period, but the point in the matter is this: By wrongful construction of the will of Congress, as enacted in 1919, for 14 long years these people have come here and have fought for the rights which Congress gave them, and the Secretary of the Interior by a wrong construction forced them to pay interest for 14 years, which they cannot collect unless this act is passed.

Many of these people are now almost on starvation because they answered the patriotic call of their Government, and I am asking the Members of the House to give us an opportunity to fully explain this matter by voting for this rule, which will give us an opportunity to go into the Committee of the Whole and have general debate on the measure, and I shall be willing at that time to answer any questions that any Member of the House may want to ask about the history or the merits of this legislation.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. May I recall to the gentleman the fact that this bill affects 91 claimants in 24 States of the Union.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct.

Mr. WOODRUM. And it has passed the Senate twice, I believe.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WOODRUM. And has been reported out by the House committee several times.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is true.

Mr. WOODRUM. But we have never been able to get it up on the floor of the House.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WOODRUM. May I also recall the fact to the gentleman that Congress, in trying to do justice by these people who had answered a patriotic call, as the gentleman from Georgia pointed out, authorized and appropriated $50,000,000 to clear up these claims, $40,000,000 of which was covered back into the Treasury, and there is now a little over $1,000,000 involved here which we have never been able to get, and I wish further to heartily concur in what the gentleman from Georgia has said.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I thank the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it not a fact that a number of the courts, possibly including the Supreme Court of the United States, have construed this question of net loss to include charges which these men had to pay for borrowed money?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is true, I will say to the gentleman from Alabama. The Supreme Court of the United States has said that the Secretary of the Interior was wrong in his first construction and ordered him to pay the interest, and then the Secretary held it was only possible to pay up to March 2, 1919, and has refused to pay anything beyond that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it not also the fact that the Secretary of the Interior has withdrawn his objection to this bill?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct and I thank the gentleman for calling it to my attention. The Secretary of the Interior now says as to this bill that it is a matter for Congress to decide what its intention was in the act of 1919 and he has therefore withdrawn his objection, and I earnestly ask the Members of the House to give us an opportunity for a fair hearing by voting for this rule so that we can go into the matter and do justice to these people who have been denied justice throughout all these years.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. LAMNECK. In view of the fact there may be some doubt about the adoption of the rule, would it not be a good idea for the gentleman to give the experience involved in the case down here in Virginia of a man who lost his property, his home, and his farm on which the mine was located, in order to illustrate the injustice that was done by the Government. I think this would add greatly to the gentleman's argument and would probably be of more help now than after the rule is adopted.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Georgia will permit, if the gentleman feels in need of more time in view of the suggestion made by the gentleman from Ohio, I yield the gentleman from Georgia 5 additional minutes.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I thank the gentleman and I shall recite briefly the history of this one claimant.

At the time the war broke out the man who owned this manganese property near Lynchburg, Va., was a young man about 24 years old. He was an architect and engineer. He was not in the mining business and had no desire to go into it, although he had had some experience as an employee of a mining company in Birmingham, Ala. He was sought out by agents of Franklin K. Lane, the Secretary of the Interior, and was requested, and, in fact, it was demanded of him, that he build mines on this property, which contained a very fine deposit of manganese ore, and finally, at the request of the Secretary of the Interior, he did so.

He did not have the money himself. He had no credit facilities. He had no right to ask credit from the bank. He went to the bank and told them the situation. The Secretary of the Interior assured the bank that if they would loan this man the money they would see that the bank sustained no loss.

He borrowed $95,000 or $100,000 and built the mine, put in a concentrating plant.

After being in operation a few weeks the war ended, and he was left with this debt, when he was out of debt before.

The mine was worth nothing for commercial purposes, because you can import manganese cheaper than you can produce it in this country.

The Government set out to give him back what he had lost. They first offered him $2,000, which he declined to accept. But they paid him that amount on account. Within 20 days they gave him another $20,000, and they negotiated back and forth, the Government making partial payments, but always denying him any interest on the borrowed money.

Of course, he still owes that bank approximately $30,000, although he has applied every dollar that the Government has given him in liquidation of this debt which was incurred at the request of the Secretary of the Interior.

For 14 or 15 years he has been paying interest to the bank on the balance of the debt which was incurred because the Secretary of the Interior requested it. He has mortgaged every bit of property he owns to maintain the loan at the bank hoping that Congress will enable him to pay off the obligation and let him go about the pursuit of his ordinary business.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Did these people receive a special bonus for production during the loan?

Mr. RAMSPECK. No; not that I know of.

Mr. LAMNECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. LAMNECK. What happened to his farm?

Mr. RAMSPECK. He was forced to mortgage his property and it was all sold and applied to this claim.

Mr. PITTENGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. PITTENGER. Are the other 91 claimants in the same situation?

Mr. RAMSPECK. This is a typical example of these claims. There is no question but that Congress intended that these people should be made whole, and they cannot be made whole unless this bill is passed.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. COX. And there is no suggestion in the bill of paying them for the properties which they originally owned and sought to develop.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Not at all. There is only one question involved in this bill, and that is the question of interest on money borrowed, a loss which the Supreme Court says is a part of the net loss.

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. MAIN. The gentleman has stated that the individual to whom he has devoted some remarks has nothing in the world left except this claim against the Government. Is it not true that he does have a rather large indebtedness to the bank, and it would be to that bank that this interest if allowed would go to help him liquidate indebtedness growing out of his efforts to cooperate with the Government in the time of its need?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Of course, the money would go to the bank, because it holds a mortgage on his property, and if he is not paid by the Government, he will not only continue to owe the bank but it will foreclose on other properties that he owns.

Mr. COX. And this man's only escape from this obligation is through bankruptcy or by the adoption of this resolution, which will enable him to discharge the debt.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is true.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein two letters I have received from the Comptroller on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include two letters he has received from the Comptroller on this subject. Is there objection?

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, did the gentleman say two letters?

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes.

Mr. PITTENGER. Dealing with this bill?

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] says that he does not feel that the House is familiar with the provisions of this measure and attributes that as the reason it was defeated in the last session of Congress. I am of opinion that the Members of this House are very familiar with this legislation, because time and again it has been before the House and has been thoroughly debated and defeated either by a direct vote or objection.

The question involved here and the big question involved is one of policy. Back in 1813 the Secretary of the Treasury—see the letter from the Comptroller General below—rendered a decision in which he held that the Government of the United States would not pay interest on outstanding claims. A few days afterward the Congress of the United States approved that policy. For 122 years the executive branch of this Government and the Congress of the United States have followed that policy and today you are asked to set it aside.

What has happened in connection with these claims? The Government has already paid out of a sum appropriated originally, $8,500,000 to these claimants. Ninety-one claimants, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] said, are scattered over 24 States, but 27 of the claimants are in one State, the State of California. Besides that $8,500,000, there has been submitted to this Congress in deficiencies $743,732.58, and the Congress has included that amount in deficiency appropriation bills and the claimants have been paid. There is now certified in the Appropriations Committee today $34,235.03 additional, or a total of $9,277,967, and on top of that the administrative expenses have been $32,600.

But that is not all. There are still 82 of these claims pending in the courts, and we do not know what the decision of the courts will be or how much more will come in as deficiencies.

As I say, the big question involved here is one of policy. The Government pays no interest on claims, with one exception, and that is where taxes are wrongfully collected. When the Government assesses additional taxes and penalties it charges interest, and therefore the Government receives equal consideration with the taxpayer.

Are you going to set aside the established policy and pay these claimants interest up to date of settlement? They have already received interest up to the date of the passage of the original act.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. Not now. Later if I have the time. I ask the Members are you going to set aside this established policy and pay these claimants $1,250,000 in interest, not counting the money that you will be asked to appropriate in the form of deficiencies when these 82 claims that are pending are settled by the courts? Remember if you do, you must also pay interest on pending claims up to date of settlement.

The Supreme Court rendered its opinion in this case. The Secretary of the Interior paid the interest up to the date of the passage of the original act, and now we are asked to take from the taxpayers of this country $1,250,000 and more besides at a later date to pay 91 claimants. If we are going to pay everybody who made any sacrifice whatsoever during the period of the war, there is not enough money in the country to pay the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield first to the gentleman from Georgia, who made the first request.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is basing his argument on the ground that we are violating precedent in that Congress is seeking to pay interest on the claim. Let me say to the gentleman that his premise is entirely erroneous, because that is not involved at all. It is to pay nothing more than the Congress authorized, the net loss.

Mr. COCHRAN. I have little time and cannot yield further. I realize that is the gentleman's argument. It was also the argument of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK]. I say they have been paid interest up to 1919, and if you are going to pay interest up to the date of the settlement of the claims, or whatever you want to call them, then every claim that has passed this House on private claims day should provide that interest be paid to those claimants. I yield now to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not a fact that if we change our whole policy now and allow these people who have had their claims settled to open them and ask for interest, we will open up an opportunity for countless millions of claims against the Federal Government?

Mr. COCHRAN. There is no doubt in the world but what the gentleman's contention is right.

Mr. SNELL. And these claims are filed and pending before the courts at the present time?

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman is entirely correct. The Department advised me this morning, besides the 91 claims, there are still 82 cases in court.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I regret I do not have the time. On every claims day you pass bills to compensate a man or woman who has been injured by a Government automobile, and he or she has been required to pay the expenses of hospital and doctors, and it is 5, 6, 7, and oftentimes 10 years after he has paid those expenses before he is compensated by Congress. Would it not be just if you pass this bill to pay interest upon the money spent as a result of an accident due to the negligence of some Government employee?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I am sorry I do not have the time.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I think the House will make a serious mistake if it changes the attitude it has taken, not once but many times, on this same bill. [Applause.]

The letters referred to are as follows:

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, March 13, 1936.

Hon. JOHN J. COCHRAN,
Chairman, Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Referring to your letter of February 28, 1936, you are advised that there has been examined S. 1432, Seventy-fourth Congress, second session, entitled "An act to amend section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919, generally known as the 'War Minerals Relief Statutes'", as follows:

"That in any claim that has heretofore been filed within the time and in the manner provided by the act approved March 2, 1919 (40 Stat. 1272), as amended, generally referred to as the 'War Minerals Relief Statutes', in which the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia under the authority conferred upon said court by the act approved February 13, 1929 (45 Stat. 1166), has adjudged or decreed interest payments or obligations to be losses reimbursable within the meaning of the act of March 2, 1919 (40 Stat. 1272), as amended, the Secretary of the Interior shall open or reopen such claim and include in his adjustments and payments of losses, interest which has been paid or has accrued to the date of approval of this act: Provided, however, That such losses shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior as a matter of fact to be the result of a legal obligation incurred within the statutory period as provided in said act of March 2, 1919: And provided further, That the sum paid in satisfying said claims shall not exceed in total $1,250,000. It is also provided that all settlements under this act and pursuant to its provisions shall constitute full and complete discharge of all obligations of the United States accruing under the War Minerals Act and acts amendatory thereof."

The issue presented by the proposed bill appears to be correctly stated in House Report No. 2002, Seventy-fourth Congress, accompanying the bill, as follows:

"The only issue placed before the Congress by the bill hereby reported is the payment of interest constituting a part of net losses which accrued after March 2, 1919, the date of the approval of the War Minerals Act.

"The Supreme Court of the United States has held that such interest must be considered a part of the 'net losses.' In a later case the Court held that when Congress passed the act of March 2, 1919, it intended for that act to constitute a cut-off date.

"It seems to this committee that there can be no question but that Congress intended in the act of March 2, 1919, to provide for all net losses up to the date of settlement with the claimants.

"No settlements for net losses involving interest were made until after the Supreme Court decision in 1933, 14 years after the Congress had directed payment of net losses. During all of these 14 years the Secretary of the Interior had contended that interest on borrowed money was not a part of the net losses, and payment had been refused.

"After the 1933 decision the Secretary of the Interior refused to pay interest beyond March 2, 1919, and he was upheld by the Supreme Court in this position.

"The result is that these claimants, approximately 91 in number and representing approximately 24 States, having fought for 14 years for rights given to them under the act of March 2, 1919, now find themselves denied full justice because it is contended the Congress set a cut-off date as of March 2, 1919.

"It will be remembered that the act of March 2, 1919, provided for payment of moneys expended and obligations incurred between April 6, 1917, to and including November 12, 1918. The obligation to pay interest on borrowed money by these claimants was incurred within the period above stated, and certainly if there is justification in paying interest from November 12, 1918, to March 2, 1919 (which has been done), there is equal justification for payment of interest on borrowed money to the date of final settlement or, as is provided in this act, to the date of the approval of this act."

That is to say, under section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919 (40 Stat. 1272), as amended by the act of November 23, 1921 (42 Stat. 322), and as further amended by the acts of June 7, 1924 (43 Stat. 634), and February 13, 1929 (45 Stat. 1166), the claimants under the war minerals relief statute have been allowed interest on borrowed money to March 2, 1919, interpreted by the courts as allowing interest on money borrowed by the claimants in connection with the prosecution of the production of war minerals. The proposed further amendment would authorize interest from March 2, 1919, to the date of the respective settlements, with the limitation that the total amount allowed should not exceed $1,250,000.

This office cannot recommend favorable action on the bill. The relief accorded in the first instance was a gratuity. There was no legal obligation on the United States to reimburse those engaged in the production of war minerals for the amount of the losses sustained by them. The Government has been most generous in reimbursing these claimants with the amount of such loss, including interest on borrowed moneys to the date of said act of March 2, 1919. It is to be remembered that except for bonded indebtedness and refund of taxes erroneously or illegally collected the United States does not pay interest on claims against it. Attention in this connection is invited to a letter of June 4, 1813, from Comptroller of the Treasury Rush to the House Committee on Claims (26 Annals 794), wherein he said:

"As interest in its application to such cases as the present is to be considered in the light of a compensation for money unjustly withheld after it is due, perhaps the Government may not, under this view, be held chargeable with it as a general rule, inasmuch as the presumption of law is that the sovereign stands ready at all times to pay what is justly due from it, and that where payment has not been made, it must be taken to be owing to some good and justifiable causes, and not to any mere neglect or default in itself or in its own officers. But, waiving this suggestion, the refusal of the Government, in its ordinary practice to pay interest, is at least sustained on equitable grounds insofar as the rule is reciprocal. For if it refuses to pay interest, it is also true that it never charges any of its debtors."

The Committee on Claims, House of Representatives, after considering said report of June 4, 1813, stated that—

"The rule which appears from the above letter to be established at the Treasury, and which has been practiced under for so long period of time, your committee cannot feel themselves at liberty to violate because they believe it to be salutary."

If there was any obligation under the act of March 2, 1919, to pay interest on borrowed money, such obligation arose with said act, but the Secretary of the Interior concluded that interest on borrowed moneys was not allowable as a loss thereunder. After the act of February 13, 1929, allowing claimants the right of appeal to the courts in any matter involving a question of law under the act of March 2, 1919, the courts held that interest on borrowed moneys was allowable thereunder, and the Secretary of the Interior did reopen and compute interest on borrowed moneys to March 2, 1919.

That is to say, the payment of interest after March 2, 1919, on moneys which have been borrowed by claimants and expended in the production of war minerals is not to be distinguished from interest considered and negatived in 1813 by both Comptroller of the Treasury Rush and the Committee on Claims, House of Representatives. Also, such a claim for interest after March 2, 1919, by reason of the delay of the Secretary of the Interior in making settlement allowing interest to said date is not to be distinguished from interest on any other claim against the United States where settlement is delayed for a period after the claim has accrued. As is well known, claims are not infrequently denied by both the administrative and accounting officers of the United States because of lack of an appropriation or believed lack of legal basis to support the claims. Thereafter, suit may be instituted against the United States and judgment entered in favor of the claimant—the courts not being restricted in the entering of judgments against the Government to the availability of an existing appropriation to pay such judgment; also, the courts taking into consideration in some cases the administrative action which gave rise to the claims. It has never been the practice of the United States to allow interest in such cases and, in fact, section 177 of the Judicial Code of March 3, 1911 (36 Stat. 1141), specifically provides that no interest shall be allowed on any claim up to the time of the rendition of judgment thereon by the Court of Claims unless upon a contract expressly stipulating for the payment of interest.

It will be noted that the precedents referred to on pages 3 and 4 of Report No. 2002, accompanying the bill, are cases where interest has been allowed to the various States on moneys borrowed by the States for use in aiding the United States in the defense of the country. The States in so doing were not, of course, engaged in a business enterprise from which they expected to earn a profit as was the situation with respect to these war mineral claimants, and it is not believed that the practice of the Government with respect to the States of the Union constitutes any precedent for application in the settlement of private claims.

As above stated, this office is unable to recommend approval of S. 1432, and you are advised accordingly.

Sincerely yours,

R. N. ELLIOTT,
Acting Comptroller General of the United States.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, April 20, 1936.

Hon. JOHN J. COCHRAN,
Chairman, Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Your letter of April 3, 1936, receipt of which was acknowledged April 6, 1936, asks my reaction on the views of those favoring bill S. 1432 and the brief which they have prepared which you attached. This office submitted to your committee a report dated March 13, 1936, and you state:

"They take issue with part of your report, maintaining that it is not a gratuity under any circumstances and that there was absolutely no profit."

The report of this office of March 13, 1936, did not recommend passage of the bill and suggested that inasmuch as the relief heretofore granted (act of Mar. 2, 1919, and subsequent enactments), as well as that by the bill proposed, being a gratuity, it seemed in the light of the general rule that interest is not allowable on claims against the United States, that claimants had been generously treated by the Congress—they having been compensated for "net losses" sustained, save as to certain interest on borrowed moneys employed in the transactions accruing since March 2, 1919.

The report by this office did not suggest that passage of the bill and payments accordingly would result in payment of profits to claimants, and in referring to the bill as providing a "gratuity"—which you state has been objected to—it is to be stated that the term was employed in its legal sense and not as one of disparagement, to distinguish between a legal obligation and a claim for relief based upon equitable considerations, and it seems admitted there was originally no legal liability on the part of the Government. See also the judicial view in this regard—decision of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, February 19, 1934, re Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, v. Cuyuna Mining & Investment Co., 69 Fed. (2d) 662, referred to in the report of March 23, 1934, of the Secretary of the Interior.

The brief submitted by proponents of the bill and transmitted by you for comment tends to clarify the purpose of the proposed legislation. It seems therefrom and from the report on the bill, under date of February 14, 1936, by the chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining of the House of Representatives, that it having been judicially established by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, of December 7, 1931 (284 U. S. 231), that under the provisions of the act of March 2, 1919, interest that had been paid or incurred for money borrowed and lost in producing the particular minerals was for consideration in determining the "net loss", it is the contention of those advocating passage of the present bill that inasmuch as such interest had been excluded by the Secretary of the Interior in determining and paying "net losses" under the act of March 2, 1919, interest on borrowed money continued to accrue, to the extent there were insufficient payments by the Government to permit of complete repayment of the moneys borrowed, plus interest then accrued, up to the date of action on claims pursuant to the decision of the Supreme Court of December 7, 1931—some 12 years—and that inasmuch as the additional payments then made allowed interest only to March 2, 1919, the decision of the Supreme Court, while establishing the right to include interest on borrowed money in determining "net loss" coming some 12 years after adjustment of losses was provided for—and limiting to March 2, 1919—actually afforded less relief than was contemplated by the act of March 2, 1919. The pending bill provides for payments in such amounts as will cover "net losses", including interest on borrowed moneys, down to passage of the bill.

The present condition arose from the failure of the then Secretary of the Interior to give full effect to the act of March 2, 1919, in that if he had then made full payments as authorized by said act the borrowed moneys could have been repaid and the accruing of interest thereon would have ceased.

The authority to settle claims under the act of March 2, 1919, was vested in the Secretary of the Interior instead of the regularly established agency for claims settlements when the Government is involved, now the General Accounting Office, and this office has not, of course, examined the claims involved in the pending bill, to ascertain the merits thereof or the facts as to application of prior payments under the act of March 2, 1919, to see just what further payments would be justified in the event the bill should become law. The bill proposes to leave the matter of further settlements wholly with the Secretary of the Interior.

With respect to whether payments under the bill, if enacted, would be a gratuity, it seems clear that such payments would represent relief based upon equity, rather than any legal liability, and thus a gratuity, because there was no legal liability as a basis for the act of March 2, 1919, and there is no legal responsibility to respond in damages arising from any claimed too-limited administration of said act by the Secretary of the Interior, which latter appears the real basis for the pending bill.

With respect to that portion of the report of March 13, 1936, by this office which suggested the general rule of the legislative branch to deny interest on claims against the Government as for consideration and possible application, and that in view of the nature of the claims and prior payments under the act of March 2, 1919, apparently covering losses, save a portion of the interest on borrowed moneys, there had been generous treatment of claimants, the brief is of little assistance save to point out that the general rule is not necessarily for application in that what is proposed is no more, with respect to making the claimants whole, than was intended by the act of March 2, 1919, and which was defeated, in part, by administration of the act and the lateness of judicial interpretation giving administration a correct guide. This, of course, is proposed to be at the further expense of the Government, involving, apparently, something over a million dollars.

Whether the relief sought should be granted is, of course, a problem for the Congress. This office has performed its duty when it has pointed out the facts, the rules generally applicable to claims, and such matters as apparently would be for consideration and which would not, naturally, be advanced by proponents of the bill.

As to the suggestion in the report by this office that in view of the nature of the claims and prior payments thereon it appeared claimants had been generously treated by the Government, there was in mind, of course, the many who suffered losses as a result of patriotic efforts during the World War and for whom nothing has been or likely will be done. There were other cases, possibly many, not unlike those here involved but for which no adjustments have been proposed. However, the problem of, in which cases, and to what extent relief shall be afforded from the Federal Treasury is one involving the responsibility of the Congress and that of the President under his veto authority.

Sincerely yours,

J. R. MCCARL,
Comptroller General of the United States.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I think the House really ought to know something about what it is doing at this time and what it is proposed that it should do. If any of the Members have the hearings that were conducted by this committee and will turn to page 7 they will see that the main claimant—and the main claimant means almost the whole hog—has already been to the well five times.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield just for one statement?

Mr. TABER. I yield for a question; yes.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Does the gentleman understand that these claimants not only received the out-of-pocket expenditures which they actually incurred but they also received interest up to some day in March of 1920 after the war? The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] was not correct when he said it was just for the duration of the war. Some $600,000 for just one claimant; and one of the parties who claims to have lost this money is now a lobbyist and has received over $15,000 in fees from the Government. This is a steal.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I say to the gentleman from Washington that there is absolutely nobody representing one of these claimants represented in this bill. No lobbyist here.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Not in the House.

Mr. RAMSPECK. No; and he is not in Washington, either.

Mr. TABER. I do not yield further, Mr. Speaker.

This claimant was the Chestatee Pyrites & Chemical Corporation, of Atlanta, Ga. He was on the stand before the committee. His testimony appears on page 7 as to when he made his first claim. A bill was first introduced on the 2d of March 1919, and under that these claimants were all supposed to make their claims, have them passed on, and that was supposed to be the whole story. Under that proposition this claimant went on, and he was awarded and paid $223,000 October 25, 1919. Then the act was amended again. They came to the House of Representatives again after they had been paid in full once.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. When I get through.

So that the gentleman will understand it and the House will understand it, another act was passed on November 16, 1921, spreading it out a little more, and this time the Chestatee Corporation was awarded a further sum of $469,784, and that was supposed to be payment in full. Then there was another stir-up, and a decision by the Secretary of the Interior, after another act had been passed on the 13th of February 1929, and on the 7th of December 1932 there was a payment of $1,584, and then again on February 23, 1933, $90,500, or five separate trips to the well for this outfit.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Not now. Then this outfit has a claim for $600,000 of the $1,250,000 that is supposed to be the limit of payment in this bill.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. TABER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has quoted from the testimony of the witness who testified in behalf of the Chestatee claim?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is familiar with the record, I presume. Is he prepared to question a single statement of fact set out in this testimony?

Mr. TABER. I do not know whether I am prepared to question any of the facts. Does the gentleman question the fact that this particular outfit has been to the well five separate times and that it still has a claim of $600,000? I wonder how far this House is going to go with that sort of doings? It seems to me that it gets worse and worse the further I go into the hearings. I cannot understand it myself. I have had some little experience in practicing law and when I went out on a claim and made a settlement of a lawsuit it was settled once and for all. That is what was supposed to have been done when this bill was passed in the first place, when it was passed in the second place, when it was passed in the third place, when it was passed in the fourth place. This is an attempt to pass it in the fifth place.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I cannot yield further at this time.

It is true there is a very considerable volume of claimants. Their listing covers pages 68 to 73, inclusive, of the hearings in rather fine print; but these claimants have very small claims, compared with that of the Chestatee Corporation.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? I think the gentleman should yield in the interest of correct information.

Mr. TABER. If I have given false information I should be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has referred to these several payments made to this particular claimant under the law as being in satisfaction of the claim. In this regard the gentleman is altogether in error, because they were not paid in settlement of the claim, but on account; and there was no receipt given as a settlement of the claim; and if the gentleman will refer to the letter of the Secretary of the Interior he will see that I am correct.

Mr. TABER. I am going to read from the letter of the Secretary of the Interior because I believe the House ought to know what the Secretary of the Interior did say:

> In many of the awards made by my predecessor since the amendment of 1929, the claimants have accepted such awards in complete and final settlement of their rights under the War Minerals Relief Act.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Not until I have finished reading this.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. I continue reading:

> One exception to this is the case of the Chestatee Corporation.

I am not going to read it all. [Laughter.]

Yes; I will read it all so the Members may have it:

> The Chestatee Pyrites & Chemical Corporation, in which awards to the amount of $929,850 have been made, on the last of which, on February 23, 1933, acceptance was made by claimant as payment of its loss in full to March 2, 1919, as stated in the award.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Not at this time; not until I have explained this matter to the House. Now, it appears that this big corporation with the $600,000 claim was smart enough not to give a receipt in full, whereas all the rest did, according to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, does the gentleman assert that the claimant should give a receipt in full when only a partial payment was made?

Mr. TABER. As far as my understanding goes, I do not think this is so. When the different acts were passed by Congress it was understood to be the end of it, not that the claimant was coming back here year after year until it had built up a tremendous amount. We are having claims all the time in addition to the $8,500,000, and all those claims under the act of 1929 were put up, and we have had to appropriate, or will have to appropriate, somewhere around $900,000. About $900,000 was the last estimate I got.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. MAAS. Does the gentleman know how much was appropriated by Congress to take care of these claims in the original instance? It was $50,000,000, was it not?

Mr. TABER. Yes; and that was just $41,500,000 more than Congress, after it had considered the matter again in 1919, thought should be appropriated; and the amount was reduced to $8,500,000. On top of this sum $900,000 more was appropriated.

Can anyone who has sat in the House of Representatives and seen bills considered imagine this House passing bills of this character without believing the bills mean a receipt in full—mean that that is all Congress is going to allow?

These people come here and tell a story. Do they tell a story that these folks did not go into this operation figuring they were going to make a profit?

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. TABER. I cannot yield; I have not time.

I do not believe any one of these claimants went into this operation expecting they were going to get out of it just even up. They expected a profit.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I believe this bill should be turned down and that a final end should be made to the process of taking money out of the Treasury five and six times for the same claim. Here is this one corporation. Do you suppose, if you were drawing a bill to meet this situation, as that corporation undoubtedly had the major part in the drawing of it, that you would figure to leave out anything the corporation was entitled to have included? That is the story the continued return to these claims presents right on its face—that this Congress has dealt exceedingly liberally with these claimants and that we ought to stop now with the liberal payments that have already been made to them and refuse to pay for the fifth and the sixth time. I hope Congress will defeat this resolution.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I shall consume the entire 10 minutes that has been allotted to me by the gentleman from Georgia, but I desire, before the House reaches the point where it is to vote upon the proposition here, that it shall fully understand not only the moral, but the legal obligation that, in my opinion, the Government is under to pay these claims. Mr. Speaker, I was here at the session of Congress when in our hour of national desperation to make every possible effort for our national defense and to carry on successfully the war in which we were engaged, the President of the United States, through one of the executive officers of his Cabinet, made an appeal to certain groups of patriotic men in America to volunteer their credit, their time, and their productive energies in order to produce at the very earliest moment for the purpose of national protection these four very essential materials for military preparation. We had a lot of patriotic men in America at that time—men in the camps, men in the front-line trenches and the citizens back home—dedicating every energy and every purpose to carry the war to a successful conclusion. The men who are filing these claims today against the Government of the United States are the type of men to whom I am referring. This appeal was made not to any one section of the country, but to the entire country. The record of the answers of these men will show it was not a sectional response in any sense, but, on the contrary, every section of the country where there was any possibility of developing these resources was found was represented. There are 90 claims here from all sections of the United States. Hundreds of men volunteered to answer this appeal of our Government in the hour of its desperation. A typical case has been cited of this man down in Virginia. A similar situation applies to these other men. They said, "All right; you are asking us to do something for our Government. We have a deposit down here which we think offers possibilities. We will answer your call and go out and borrow money. We have not got it, but we will pledge our credit in order to carry out this proposition." They did that, but before there was any real volume of production the war closed.

In what shape did it leave these men? They had borrowed money. They had pledged their credit. The banks held their obligations. They had to close down these plants, and thereafter the deposits were of no commercial or strategic value to anyone, but these patriotic men, in the meantime, were obligated as men of honor and men of credit to meet their obligations. They are not asking this Government for any profit on these war operations. They are not attempting to come back here four or five or six times, as the gentleman from New York states, to make additional demands. No honest debt is settled until it is settled in full, even if there have been partial payments made upon it.

Mr. Speaker, this claim is not only a moral claim against the Government of the United States, but it is a legal claim also, because the Supreme Court of the United States of America has held that the payment of interest upon an obligation made under a contract constitutes a legitimate part of the net losses of the person who is undertaking the enterprise, and that is all that is involved in this bill. It is not interest on profit. It is not interest on investment, but interest upon the actual loss that these men have suffered. Their creditors are asking them to pay this money today, and many of these men are standing at the very door of the bankruptcy court, threatened with repudiation of their credit. That is the situation. I would be ashamed—and I say this as sincerely and as earnestly as I have ever said anything in my life—if this great Government of ours, in view of the record, in view of the equities of the case, in view of the legal position of these claims, repudiated these honest obligations that it owes to these patriotic citizens. [Applause.]

The Supreme Court of the United States passed upon the matter and they have held that this is a legal obligation. There is no use discussing the moralities of the situation as reflected in our duty to pay where there is a debt due.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOODRUM. In addition to what the gentleman has stated, and in connection with the question of net losses, may I recall this fact to him? The Virginia case to which reference has been made came from my district and I know personally about the facts. If this bill is passed, of course, it definitely and finally disposes of these cases.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Absolutely.

Mr. WOODRUM. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it does not by any manner or means reimburse these people for their actual outlays, for this reason: When it came to the settlement and decision of what were net investments and net losses, by strict construction placed upon the act by the Court of Claims, many items that were legitimately invested were not allowed. These people lost that money. They lost these expenses. They lost everything. They had to go through all these years in trying to be made whole by the Government. So they are not by any manner or means out of the woods on the transaction if this bill is passed, even though it definitely disposes of these particular cases.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Absolutely; and the statement made by the gentleman from Virginia is another cumulative argument in favor of the adoption of this rule and the passage of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for information?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand the situation, the largest claimant here has had his claim settled for $900,000. Am I correct?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No. I think the gentleman is in error.

Mr. SNELL. Well, that was the statement made by the gentleman from New York, and he took the facts from the record. The gentleman from New York informs me that statement appears in the hearings.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not deny that large sums were paid some of these claimants.

Mr. SNELL. That is the sum stated in the record.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The final report shows the fact.

Mr. SNELL. On the basis of a $900,000 or a $1,000,000 claim, how can there be a claim at the present time for over $600,000?

Mr. COX. Because payments have gone to the discharge of interest on the debt.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me to answer that question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will be pleased to yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] that this bill does not appropriate one dime to any particular claimant. The question of how much, if any, money any claimant received is a matter for decision by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SNELL. But this $600,000 is one of the claims you are considering.

Mr. RAMSPECK. We do not know what that man will get, but we think it is approximately one-half a million dollars or maybe a little more.

Mr. SNELL. How could he have a claim of one-half a million dollars on a million-dollar final settlement?

Mr. RAMSPECK. For the reason that only partial payments were made over a period of 15 years and he was paying interest on nearly $700,000 of borrowed money, but all this does not have anything to do with the principle involved in this measure.

Mr. SNELL. You could not figure that interest on $700,000 for the entire time would amount to $600,000.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Whatever it is, the Secretary will determine.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Just a word, in conclusion. Upon the facts stated by me and based upon what the gentlemen who have spoken here have said, I appeal to this House to adopt this rule and to pass this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. PITTENGER].

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I have only 4 minutes and I am not going to yield until I have finished my statement.

I hope this rule is adopted, and if it is adopted, some of the misunderstandings that have been created here can be cleared up in the 2 hours that will be allowed for general debate.

In answer to the statement of the gentleman from Missouri about establishing a new precedent, all I ask you to do is to read the report, and you will realize that you are starting nothing new.

In answer to the statement made about this Georgia case, as well as the other cases, I know the facts in the Georgia case. I know that man had a going business. I know he lost his mines when the war closed him down, and I know that in his old age today he is facing bankruptcy. This is the Georgia case.

I also know that these people have not been paid in full, and if they had not had to fight with war mineral boards and Government officials over a period of 16 years to get these awards, they would not be here today. If these payments had been made 16 years ago, the bill would not be here now. I have two of them in my district, and I know the facts in these cases, and if the ladies and gentlemen of this House will take the time, as I have done, to go into these matters, there will not be a single vote against this rule. The least we can do is to give the author of this bill time under the rule to answer these questions and to explain these misunderstandings.

I do not know what the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] means when he talks about going to the well. For 16 years able-bodied, patriotic men and women who took their Government at its word, have been begging and begging so they would not die in the poorhouse.

This rule ought to be adopted——

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PITTENGER. I yield.

Mr. MAAS. Is it not true that even if these claims are paid, every single claimant will have lost money in a substantial amount?

Mr. PITTENGER. This Georgia man lost his mines. I have talked with him and he is now 70 years old. He was one of the big businessmen at the time, and he is now broke. This is true of my constituents, and it is true of others.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me in regard to the case from Georgia, which the gentleman from New York referred to?

Mr. PITTENGER. I yield.

Mr. COX. If this bill is passed and all the money that the Chestatee Co. gets goes to its creditors, it will still leave them shy about one-half or one-fourth of a million dollars.

Mr. PITTENGER. More than that.

Mr. COX. And in addition, the Pratt Bros. will have lost a prosperous piece of property which they had when it was commandeered by the Government.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PITTENGER. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I call attention to the case of one of the claimants, a certain Minnesota citizen, whom I shall not embarrass by naming. Some years ago he was one of the leading businessmen of my State and was financially, as well as otherwise, very substantial. One of the cities of the Cuyuna Range in Minnesota was named for him. When I was Governor of my State I was called to Duluth to confer upon him a medal of merit in testimony of the recognition of his fellow citizens that he was the leading citizen of his community and had rendered it the most distinguished service during the year. This man is today operating a filling station in the city of Duluth because the United States Government, which he trusted, broke him. I do not believe that Congress will refuse to reimburse him.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I have none of these claimants in my district, or, so far as I know, in my State, but I do know that this matter has been presented before the Rules Committee on several occasions, and I do feel that there has been a great deal of confusion about it, and that it ought to be considered by the House under this rule, which will be the first opportunity the House has ever had to hear the merits or demerits of the bill to be discussed.

This is not a bill to pay interest on a claim.

We have one such bill of my own city and one of my own State, and nothing has been done about those bills. This is not a bill to pay interest; it is not a bill to recoup interest in addition to the amount of the damage. It is to pay the amount of interest which was an integral part of the losses due to the insistence of the Government that the claimants go into the business and incur the obligations.

There are a lot of people in this country who say that our own Government deals more harshly, more technically with its own citizens than private individuals would ever dare to deal, and this often happens where the amount claimed is large. You have seen time and again meritorious claims objected to because the amount claimed was large. That was one reason for the attempted change of the rule for the consideration of the Private Calendar.

Our Government often takes recourse to every technicality, sending these particular claimants to the Supreme Court of the United States four times to determine what "net loss" meant. After the Supreme Court had determined what "net loss" did mean and had decided that it included "interest paid", our Government is still fighting its own citizens against a meritorious claim.

I believe this rule should be adopted so that we may get down to the discussion of the merits of this bill. I personally have heard it discussed before the Committee on Rules three times, and I have never had any doubt as to the merits of the measure. I trust that the rule will be adopted and that the bill will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COOPER of Tennessee). The question is on the passage of the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were 104 ayes and 23 noes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is no quorum present. The call is automatic. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 226, nays 58, not voting 143, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The doors were opened.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1432, the War Minerals Claims Act, with Mr. BEAM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], in discussing this matter under the rule, attempted to leave the impression that these claimants had come to Congress and sought certain settlements and received them and then had come back three, four, and five times, when, as a matter of fact, the gentleman from New York knows, because he has studied this matter, that that is not a correct picture of the facts.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield there, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Just as soon as I finish my statement I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman to answer any question he may want to ask.

The gentleman from New York knows that in the Chestatee case, to which he referred, the record showed their original claim was for over $900,000. The gentleman knows also, if he has studied the case, as I think he has, that all of these claims were filed for the full amount and had to be filed promptly after the passage of the act in 1919. They could not come back again under the law. There has not been any law authorizing them to come back again. There have been several amendments to this act.

Now, if the gentleman from New York desires me to yield on that point I will yield now.

Mr. TABER. No. The gentleman can finish his statement.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The original act, as I stated in the debate on the rule, was passed in 1918, and was not acted upon because the Attorney General ruled that it was a war measure and the war was over. This act of March 2, 1919, which we are now proposing to amend, was amended in 1921 at the request of the Secretary of the Interior. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] left the impression that these claimants came back every time and got this act amended. As a matter of fact, the record shows that the Secretary of the Interior himself asked for the amendment of 1921 because he recognized that he had made mistakes in administering the law, and the Comptroller of the Treasury Department held that he could not correct those mistakes. So he was man enough to come to Congress and ask for the correction so that he could go back and reopen the claims where he had made mistakes and rectify them.

In addition to that, the purpose of the amendment of 1921 was to take care of certain claims which had been mailed within the statutory limit provided in the original act, but had not been received in time, and he wanted to consider those claims. At the request of the Secretary of the Interior, Congress made that amendment.

The amendment of 1924 simply dealt with the aggregate amount disbursed under the act. I do not recall how that happened to be passed or who asked that it be passed.

The act of 1929, of course, was passed at the instance of the claimants, and they had a right to ask that it be passed. The results of the litigation in the Supreme Court of the United States justifies them in that position.

If you will get a copy of the hearings and read the decision of the Supreme Court, you will see that the Supreme Court overruled the various Secretaries of the Interior on the question of taxes paid, on the question of allowance for salaries to people in these companies, and various and sundry and other questions where the Secretary had disallowed parts of the claims which they filed and to which they were justly entitled.

One of the things involved was the question of interest on money which was lost in the operation and which constitutes a part of the net loss. First, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia held that they were not entitled to that because, they said, it was not a part of the net losses. The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia overruled the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and that case went to the Supreme Court of the United States. The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, which was rendered by Mr. Justice McReynolds, is in the hearings, if any Member desires to refer to it. Mr. Justice McReynolds held that the various Secretaries of the Interior had been wrong in their construction of the act, and that they ought to have paid interest on the money borrowed and lost because it was, within the meaning of the law, a part of the net losses which the Congress directed to be paid.

The whole record in this case is well known. It has all been printed in Senate documents and in hearings before the various committees. There is absolutely no question, except interest, which the Supreme Court held to be a part of net losses, involved in this bill, despite the effort to prejudice you against this bill because of the fact that one of the claimants happens to be a large claim.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Have any of these claimants ever signed a receipt in full or signed a release in full to the Government of the United States on any of these claims?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Absolutely not on any claim which will be affected by the bill now before the Committee for consideration. That is not only stated in the record, but in the last letter which the Secretary of the Interior wrote, in which he withdrew his objection to the bill, he said he was mistaken in making that statement, and that is one of the reasons why he withdrew his objection to the bill. They did get partial payments from time to time while they were continuing to contend all the time that there were others items which ought to be paid to them.

The situation is that the claimants involved have borrowed money within the period which the law said is covered by this original act. When they received these partial payments, in accordance with the laws of the States where they were domiciles, they did just what you, I, or any other person owing money would do—applied the payment first to the interest and then to reducing the principal of their debt. This is the custom and the law in every State I know anything about. In that way these people made payments on their obligations as soon as they could.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand the situation at the present time with respect to the Chestatee Co., which is the largest claimant involved, and the one we have discussed more than any other, it is that they filed claim in 1919 for $914,000, that this was the full claim they had against the Federal Government.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I think that is approximately correct.

Mr. SNELL. I am speaking of approximate figures, of course. Within a very few days they received a payment of $223,000; in other words, their claim was reduced to $691,000.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I would not say they received it within a very few days.

Mr. SNELL. They received it on October 25 of the same year, according to the statement I have just read.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct. They received $223,000 on October 25 of that year.

Mr. SNELL. And then reduced their claim to $691,000, and would leave only $691,000 in October 1922.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not agree with the gentleman's statement, because interest had been running on $645,000 which they borrowed, and which interest the Supreme Court later held they were entitled to.

Mr. SNELL. I am limiting my present discussion to their claim against the Federal Government. It is to be taken for granted that the company filed claim for the full amount they expected to get.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. In October of 1922 they received $469,000. In April of 1932 they received an additional $44,000, and in June of 1933 they received $1,584 more. So it could not possibly figure out that the full amount of their claim at the present time is anything like $600,000.

Mr. RAMSPECK. All right; I submit this question to the gentleman from New York. The gentleman has read this bill, I presume.

Mr. SNELL. I have read it, but I admit I do not understand it.

Mr. RAMSPECK. No matter what the company may claim is due, they will not get a nickel out of this bill unless the Secretary of the Interior orders it paid. The matter is left in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from Georgia very kindly gave me the figures I have used.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, the statement of the gentleman from Georgia is absolutely correct. Until the Secretary of the Interior agrees they will not receive one dollar.

Mr. SNELL. No matter how the claim is figured, and interest on the claim, it could not possibly amount to $600,000 at the present time.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I may say to the gentleman from New York that I cannot in my head figure what the situation would be as to interest. I take the position that it does not make any difference, so far as this bill is concerned, what they are claiming, because we leave the matter where it has always been, in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, to determine what amount, if any, they are entitled to, or what any other claimant is entitled to. We are not legislating one nickel to any claimant under this bill. We are not changing the right of the Secretary of the Interior to determine what, if any, claim is due. We are dealing solely with a principle; that is, that they are entitled to this interest for 14 years which they did not get because of the wrongful construction of an act by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. It seems to me this controversy presents an accounting problem that could be better settled by accountants working for the Secretary of the Interior at leisure than by dispute amongst Members of this House under the excitement of debate.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I agree with the gentleman absolutely. It does not make any difference, as to the merits of this bill, what they will get or whether they get anything.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. This bill does not in the slightest degree interfere with the authority and jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior in the liquidation and settlement of claims as set out in section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919. In other words, it is entirely discretionary with the Secretary of the Interior what any claimant receives, and they must meet certain conditions or they will not receive anything. The Chestatee Co. must go to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. PITTENGER. The gentleman from New York asked if it was not a fact that different awards were made on different items over a period of years. When the awards were received they were applied first to payment of interest and then to a reduction of principal, so far as the particular payment was concerned, and for this reason the claimants have never been able to wipe out losses they sustained.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. PITTENGER. The Secretary of the Interior uses a different method in determining their claims.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is true. It is entirely up to him, but there is no appeal from the Secretary of the Interior as to what amount shall be paid.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. The gentleman has stated that these payments were made, and I desire to read one sentence from section 5 of part II of the act of 1919, which is absolutely conclusive on the situation:

> That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to adjust, liquidate, and pay such net losses as have been suffered by any person, firm, or corporation by reason of producing or preparing to produce either manganese, chrome, pyrites, tungsten—

And so forth. Does the gentleman see any possible construction of that language other than the fact that if the Secretary of the Interior made any payment at all it had to be under a receipt in full? The language is plain.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That was the construction which the Comptroller of the Treasury placed on the matter, and I just stated to the gentleman a while ago that the record discloses the Secretary of the Interior discovered he had made errors in making some of these awards, but the Comptroller of the Treasury held he could not correct them. Thereupon the Secretary himself came to the Congress in 1921 and asked for an amendment to the act, which was approved on November 23, 1921, and may I read to the gentleman the final paragraph:

> If in claims passed upon under said act awards have been denied or made on rulings contrary to the provisions of this amendment, or through miscalculation, the Secretary of the Interior may award proper amounts or additional amounts.

That is what happened in every one of these cases. He made erroneous rulings and the case we are trying to correct now went on 14 or 15 years. The man was denied interest on money borrowed, and this interest was a part of his loss. The Supreme Court said the Secretary was wrong.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. I wonder if the House fully understands that these people were assured by the Government they would not suffer any loss if they would yield to the Government in producing the things we needed in time of war?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I am glad the gentleman brought that up, because insofar as these cases which are covered by the proposal now before the Committee are concerned, it has been judicially determined that each one of them did engage in this business at the specific request of either the Secretary of the Interior, the Bureau of Mines, the Geological Survey, or the Shipping Board, as I recall it. There were three or four agencies named in the original act. Before the Secretary of the Interior would even consider a claim the first thing he determined was that they had acted in good faith in response to a request from one of the specified agencies of the Government, and about half of the claims filed were ruled out on that point. If that was not determined as a prerequisite, the Secretary of the Interior did not go any further with any of the claims.

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BIERMANN. If, under the act of 1921 and the amendment thereto, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to settle these claims, and if the Supreme Court has decided that interest and other items form part of the just claims, what is the necessity or purpose of this legislation?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I may say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIERMANN] that the first case which went to the Supreme Court on the question of interest was decided solely on the point of interest being a part of the net loss within the meaning of the act and directed the Secretary of the Interior to pay those net losses. Then, when the mandate of the Supreme Court went back, the Secretary said, "Well, that means payment of interest as a part of the net loss only up to March 2, 1919", the date of the original act. Bear in mind this happened in 1933, 14 years after the passage of the act; so these people who had been paying interest for all these 14 years said, "That is not fair. You were supposed to pay our net losses and we have been paying interest now for 14 years since this act was passed." They would not take it and the case went back to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court in that case upheld the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. And the law covered the net loss and the obligations incurred.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes. The act all the way through said, "For all obligations incurred"; and we contend that the interest was incurred during the war period.

Mr. BIERMANN. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman, but I cannot get it through my head just why this legislation is necessary as long as the act of 1921 is there, and so long as the Supreme Court held that these are just claims.

Mr. RAMSPECK. If I gave the gentleman the impression that the Supreme Court said that interest beyond the date of the original act, March 2, 1919. was to be paid, I gave him the wrong impression. That is when they upheld the Secretary of the Interior in the second case.

Mr. BIERMANN. This covers, then, some of the items not covered by the act of 1921?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It was the intention of Congress that these people should be reimbursed for their net losses and obligations to be incurred?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. And the Supreme Court held that could not be done up to March 2, 1919, and for the lack of clarifying by statute what was the intent of Congress it is necessary to have this bill enacted now to show it was the intent of Congress that all net losses and all obligations incurred from April 6, 1917, to November 18, 1918, are entitled to be compensated for.

Mr. CURLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CURLEY. I listened very attentively to the gentleman from Georgia explaining this proposition today in connection with the discussion on the rule. I was very much impressed with what he said at the beginning when he mentioned the fact that the Government was trying to mobilize its resources at that time for the purpose of prosecuting the World War. I am talking about the situation which led up to the contract that was ultimately entered into. I understood the gentleman from Georgia stated that the Government was unable to get the manganese necessary to prosecute the war. Of course, in normal times we would get all we want from the other side.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CURLEY. But due to the fact no shipping was available at the time, it was necessary for the Government to get such minerals from sources of a domestic nature and to call upon these men you are talking about that had this property to enter into contracts with the Government for the purpose of supplying the minerals necessary to prosecute the war.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct. They were asked to do it, and they did so at the request of the Government, and the Government promised to make them whole; and they will not be made whole unless this bill is passed.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. PITTENGER. Referring to the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], is it not a fact that interest was running over a period of 3 or 4 years before the Government investigators acted and began paying any of these claims?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Well, the first payment made in the Chestatee case, which the gentleman was referring to, was made in October 1919. Another payment was made 3 years later, and I call the attention of the House and the Committee to the fact that from then on it was 10 years before they ever got another nickel out of this claim. For 10 years they were fighting here for their rights, which the Congress had given them, but from 1922 to 1932 they did not get a nickel.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the passage of this bill enable a final settlement, once and for all, of the claims involved in this measure?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is absolutely correct. It is plainly stated in this measure that as to the 91 claims involved in this matter, when they are paid under this bill, they must sign a receipt in full.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. If the war had gone on it would have been absolutely necessary for the Government to have had these war minerals and, of course, no one could tell when the war was going to end; in fact, it ended much sooner than most of us thought it would.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is absolutely true.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. And one of the most pressing problems we had was in connection with a shortage of ships. We had no vessels in which to bring these minerals in from other countries and we had to provide our own supply of these war minerals here in the United States, and the Government went to these men and asked them to do that very thing.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct. The record is very clear on that and there can be no dispute about it.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Upon the passage of this bill there will practically be a termination of the activities of the war minerals branch of the Department of the Interior?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is my understanding. The matter is practically wound up with certain decisions of the court that have been rendered in other cases and upon the passage of this bill, I think it can be wound up.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. What assurance have we of that? That is what we understood when we passed these other amendments, and now you come again and say that if you get this bill passed, it will end it.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The language of this bill is plain——

Mr. SNELL. The language of the other acts have been plain and complete, but nevertheless they found new claims and came back to Congress, and we amended the old act.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Of course, the gentleman has been here longer than I have, and he knows that no Member of the House can give any assurance about what some future Congress may do.

Mr. SNELL. A Member who has been here as long as I have, I understood, gave that assurance to the House.

Mr. RAMSPECK. This is the only time there has ever been written into the statute itself that this should constitute full settlement. This is written in this measure, so we are at least making that much progress, and I hope the gentleman will help us.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BEAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill S. 1432, found itself without a quorum and he caused the roll to be called, when 250 Members answered to their names, and he handed in the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal.

The Committee resumed its session.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, it is usual when a bill of this character is presented to the House that there be some real reason given why the bill should be enacted into law by the proponents of the bill before those who feel conscientiously obliged to oppose it are called upon to go into the thing into its entirety.

Frankly, I am led to the conclusion that the proponents do not believe that the bill itself has any merit.

While the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] had the floor I called attention to some facts with reference to the situation. I am going to call attention to some other facts and then call attention to those that I brought out while he was on the floor, and to those things that have happened in connection with the history of the legislation with reference to this subject over the past 15 or 16 years.

On the 5th of October 1918 a law was passed permitting the Secretary of the Interior to do certain things with reference to certain minerals which are the subject of this legislation.

There was set aside $50,000,000 to take care of the revolving fund for carrying out the purposes of the act.

After the war was over the Secretary of the Interior was not permitted, as the gentleman from Georgia has told you, to make settlement with the people who had gone ahead under this act.

Now, the situation was this: They had the claims presented for consideration. The claims were numerous—something like several hundred, as I understand.

On the 2d of March 1919 a bill was passed which authorized the Secretary of the Interior "to adjust, liquidate, and pay such net losses as had been suffered by any individual, firm, or corporation."

To my mind, and to the mind of any fair-minded person, that meant that if he made a settlement that was a settlement in full. I cannot figure any other way out of that situation. A lot of these people have these claims and a lot of money was paid as a result of those claims. I shall call attention to a few of them. I called attention when I took the floor with reference to the adoption of the rule to this claim of the Chestatee Corporation.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman read section 5 and stated the way he interpreted it is that net loss was in the settlement of the claims.

Mr. TABER. Absolutely. The language, to my mind, can be interpreted in no other way or interpreted fairly in no other way.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman would be absolutely correct if the net losses had been paid, but the difficulty is that the Secretary of the Interior never paid the net losses.

Mr. TABER. I shall go into that as we go along. I am rather inclined to believe that he had.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It leaves it absolutely in his discretion in the future to determine that, does it not? There is nothing in this bill that will take away any of the prerogatives of the Secretary of the Interior to liquidate and finally settle these claims; and, if the net losses have been paid, then nobody gets any payment.

Mr. TABER. The authority of the Secretary of the Interior under that act of March 2, 1919, was limited to a gross payment of eight and a half million dollars.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Not at all. It was limited to the net losses, and Congress merely set aside eight and a half million dollars out of the $50,000,000 appropriation, and there was no limitation as to dollars and cents except in that one particular act.

Mr. TABER. I am going to read the gentleman just what the situation was, and I hope that he will follow me:

Provided, however, That the payments and disbursements made under the provisions of this section for and in connection with the payments and settlements of the claims herein described, and the said expenses of administration, shall in no event exceed the sum of $8,500,000.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. And if at that time the Secretary had paid the net losses, it would not have exceeded the eight and a half million dollars.

Mr. TABER. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman, although we have paid a great deal more than the eight and a half million dollars, and there are pending some other claims on which the present statutes require further appropriations. There was a group of claims presented in addition to that I told you about, of 15 or 20 which received additional awards in 1934, totaling $504,000. At that time we were told that there were probably $900,000 coming along. The total amount that has been paid and probably will be paid without further legislation, as I understand it, will run about $10,000,000. I believe these people went into this proposition absolutely believing that they were going to make a profit. Most of them have been paid a lot of money. The question at issue at the time this thing came up, was whether or not the salvage value of their properties acquired after the investment they had made as a result of their supposed contracts with the Secretary of the Interior, was one amount or another. After that law was passed we went along a little further, and some payments were paid under the 1919 law. I want the membership of the House to realize that this law of 1919 was unquestionably passed at the instance and at the request of those Members of Congress who represented districts where these claims existed. That is the usual practice. I was not here at that particular time; it goes back further than I do, but I am sure that that was the situation.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman has not any objection to the wisdom of the act of March 2, 1919, has he?

Mr. TABER. If they had stopped there, I would not have, but I do call attention of the House to the number of times this has come back. On November 23, 1921, another act was passed, and I assume that was at the instance of Members of Congress who represented the districts where the claimants resided.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I decline to yield at this time. This must have been as far as they anticipated they could ask Congress ever to go. That was the second time they came.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will not the gentleman yield now?

Mr. TABER. Not now. Then after that, in order that they might get away from the limitations of eight and a half million dollars, another act was passed on the 7th of June 1924, and I assume that was passed at the instance and request of the Members of Congress who represented those districts in which the claimants resided, and I am practically certain of that because I was here at that time and I remember the interest that a great many people had in that bill.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Before the gentleman gets away from the act of 1921, which has already been passed over, the reason why that was passed, was it not, was because the Secretary of the Interior had made errors and the Congress stated in the very act that the purpose of it was because of errors that the Secretary of the Interior had made when he was failing to carry out the act of Congress of March 21, and give them the net losses, because the act plainly says, "through miscalculations."

So, therefore, Congress at that time knew that the Secretary of the Interior, in carrying out the March 2, 1919, law had made errors which the Congress itself was seeking to correct. Is not that the fact?

Mr. TABER. I do not know whether that is the fact or not. There is nothing in the act that I can see that says that, but I may not see it all.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Let me read the last paragraph, which says this:

If in claims passed upon under said act, awards have been denied or made on rulings contrary to the provisions of this amendment, or through miscalculation, the Secretary of the Interior may award proper amounts or additional amounts.

Mr. TABER. That is true. I do not think I ought to yield any further. But that is not a declaration that such mistakes had been made.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Did not Congress put it in the bill?

Mr. TABER. It is a declaration that if the Secretary of the Interior or anyone else made mistakes he might award the proper amounts, but after that was done, still other payments were made. After that law was passed, the claim of the Chestatee Corporation was increased from $223,000, which was paid in accordance with the act of October 2, 1919, up to almost $684,000. It must be that that was intended to be made, and must have been accepted, in accordance with the provisions of the act of 1919 as payment in full. Why should we not stand on those payments in full when we made them and passed two acts?

But we were not satisfied with that, because we passed another act in 1924, and, as I understand, some payments were made. Then we come into another act in 1929, and these people got further payments. For instance, this Chestatee Corporation under that act received three further payments, one on March 14, 1932, of $40,000; another on December 7 of $1,584; and another on February 23, 1933, of $90,500. These corporations and these businesses, as a result of this act, and the various amendatory acts, have received large awards, increasing awards each time. I can remember when the 1929 act came in, and I know that the Congressmen representing those districts were back of it.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Should they not be back of it?

Mr. TABER. I am not criticizing the Congressmen. They are entitled to get back of any act to protect the interests of the people of their own districts, but we first had a bill which provided, I believe, by its fair interpretation, for settlement in full. Then we had four other bills which permitted changes and raises to be made in the amounts that should be paid. Now, we have a fifth bill coming in here, which permits still another raise and extension in the amount that can be paid. I frankly do not see why this House, after having passed one bill, which absolutely and clearly means complete settlement, should change its position and increase five or six times the amounts that can be paid.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman know of any new information that has come before the committee or that has been placed before the House that they did not have a year ago, when they went on record as opposed to the payment of this bill?

Mr. TABER. I do not.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has expired.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The letter from the Secretary of the Interior has come in since.

Mr. SNELL. I have just read it and there is not any very definite information there. He does not say he favors the payment of this claim.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The Secretary of the Interior said he was opposed to it on account of the appropriation.

Mr. SNELL. And he says now that the House may do as it is of a mind to do.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. He does not say he is in favor of the bill.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. He leaves it to the wisdom of the Congress to do equity and justice to these people.

Mr. TABER. The Secretary of the Interior previously opposed the bill because he felt that the claimants, as a result of their acceptance of awards, had given a release in full. I do not see how he could have made an award without it being accepted as a release in full under this act. After that situation was over, I do not know why, but the Secretary of the Interior did go so far as to say, "Without recommending the passage of the bill I withdraw my previous objection in the belief that the Congress should say what was the intention of the original act."

Are we going to say that the intention of the original act was something different than it says itself? When the act itself says that the settlement shall be final and conclusive, are we going to say that "final and conclusive" does not mean a single thing? That is just the situation. Does "final and conclusive" mean anything, or does it mean that we will come back and keep coming for more money? That is the history of this case.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Perhaps there is some money left in the Treasury.

Mr. TABER. A lot of folks think there is a lot of money left in the Treasury. Frankly, if we paid our bonds there would not be any money left in the Treasury.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Of course, under this bill no money comes out of the Treasury; it is already there, placed there by this administration to pay these claims.

Mr. TABER. Already there! The money does not come out of the Treasury! I hope the gentleman will join me in an attempt to amend the bill to provide that none of the money shall come out of the Treasury.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have not heard the gentleman from New York complain about the W. P. A. or the P. W. A. projects in his district.

Mr. TABER. The gentleman has not heard me come out here and ask for any W. P. A. or P. W. A. money in my district. I have not. I voted against every one of these racketeering propositions to destroy the morale of the American people that has been presented here, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. O'CONNOR rose.

Mr. TABER. I do not care what the gentleman wants to say, I am not going to yield to him now. He can get some time in his own right, but I do not propose to have the gentleman misrepresent my position.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. TABER. No; I cannot yield further; I have not the time.

Mr. SMITH of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BEAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 1432) to amend section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919, generally known as the War Minerals Relief Statutes, had come to no resolution thereon.

CAPT. PERCY WRIGHT FOOTE

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 7092, an act for the relief of Capt. Percy Wright Foote, United States Navy, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 6, strike out all after "admiral" down to and including "grade", in line 8, and insert "Provided, That he shall remain on the active list of the Navy in his present rank until the report of the next senior selection board of the Navy shall have been approved: Provided further, That if selected for promotion he shall be retained in his present rank on the active list until promoted to the rank of rear admiral, and in the event of his selection and subsequent promotion he shall be carried as an additional number in grade."

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. EATON (at the request of Mr. BACHARACH), indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. BOYKIN (at the request of Mr. HILL of Alabama), indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. STARNES (at the request of Mr. HILL of Alabama), indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. GAVAGAN (at the request of Mr. CULLEN), indefinitely, on account of official business.

To Mr. FARLEY, for 6 days, on account of important business.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED

A concurrent resolution of the Senate of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. Con. Res. 37. Concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of additional copies of each part of Senate Report No. 944, concerning the manufacture and sale of arms and other war munitions; to the Committee on Printing.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 396. An act for the relief of the Virginia Engineering Co., Inc.;

CHARLES F. BOOTS

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I wish to interrupt the legislative proceeding for a brief moment to express my personal high regard for a very valuable employee of the Senate who today is leaving the employment of the Senate and entering what he believes are broader fields of work. For 13 years this employee has been in the office of the legislative counsel of the Senate, and for 6 years has been legislative counsel for this body. In the course of that time he has assisted every Member of the Senate in the study and preparation of important legislation. It is my belief that the Senate has never had an employee who has been more faithful to his trust than has this gentleman, or one who has played in a very modest way a greater part in legislative achievements.

Charles F. Boots has been most valuable to the Congress and the country. Possessed of an extraordinary mind, courteous, and always accommodating, he will be missed by all of us. I am sure, Mr. President, I express the sentiments of the Finance Committee and of every Member of the Senate when I say that we regret that he is resigning as legislative counsel of this body, and we wish for him every success in this new and broader field of private employment and send with him the blessings of the Senate.

ACADEMIC FREEDOM

Mr. WALSH. I present and request to have treated as in the nature of a petition a statement adopted by the National Catholic Educational Association at a convention in New York City, N. Y., on the 16th instant, on the subject of academic freedom, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the statement was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT ON ACADEMIC FREEDOM ADOPTED BY NATIONAL CATHOLIC EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION AT CONVENTION IN NEW YORK CITY, APRIL 16, 1936

Our American democracy is in the process of adjusting itself to the dislocations that have occurred in our economic life and is in search of new mechanisms to promote the liberty and equality to which our Nation is dedicated. Thoughtful people sense the danger that good intention may outstrip wisdom, and there is a growing sensitivity concerning the various freedoms that must at all costs be preserved if democracy is to survive. In the forefront of these freedoms is the freedom to teach, the right of schools, and the means of education to search out and propagate the truth.

Academic freedom is not academic license. It does not guarantee to any individual the right to teach whatever he pleases nor to impose on the immature, the uncritical, the unwary his own untested intellectual idiosyncracies. It must not be forgotten that man is essentially a social being; that he is begotten by and must live with his fellows. There are truths that underlie the proper and just association of man with man. To these truths we have a sacred obligation.

Academic freedom is freedom to teach what is true and to receive instruction in what is true. When it comes to defining what is true, Catholic education seeks the guidance not only of the natural law but of the supernatural revelation that has come to us from God through Jesus Christ our Lord, and which is interpreted for us by the church. This truth we insist on our right to teach. We protest that those who maintain that education based on religion has no right to support from public funds are violating academic freedom. They are depriving a large group of their fellow citizens of adequate facilities for instructing their children in the truths they deem necessary for their eternal welfare and for the well-being of the state.

The state has no authority to determine what is and what is not true. Its function is to see that adequate provisions are made for the education of all its citizens and that in every field that is necessary for the common welfare. When in the name of academic freedom things are taught that violate the fundamental moral law, the state has the duty to intervene for the protection of its citizens and the preservation of its own existence. However, there is no room in a free country for any centralized political domination of education. Let not the schools be made the playthings of politics nor the organs of a false patriotism. Teachers are not civil servants—they are the agents of the home. When they are forced by law to take oaths of allegiance to the Government, a step is being taken in a dangerous direction. The logical eventuality will be state monopoly of schools and an education based on political indoctrination.

We insist on the fundamental right of the parent to control the education of his children. The school must correspond to the home, of which it is by nature and by history an extension. Hence the necessity of safeguarding in every possible way the American tradition of the local control of schools. We hereby voice once more, with all the emphasis of which we are capable, our opposition to the assumption on the part of the Federal Government of any authority over the schools of the United States. We are opposed to the creation of a Federal Department of Education or of any mechanism that would amount to the same thing. We are concerned lest the activities in the field of education which the Federal Government has inaugurated because of the exigencies of the times may be organized on some permanent basis and the foundation thus be laid for the domination of American education or any of its phases on the part of Washington.

RELIEF OF INDIANS

Mr. BENSON. In view of the drastic demands for renewal of direct relief grants from the Federal Government to the States, and the specific problem created by the necessity for further relief to the Indians, I respectfully request permission to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a letter from L. P. Zimmerman, State Emergency Relief Administrator for Minnesota, and an excerpt from the minutes of the State executive council of the State of Minnesota, and also an accompanying memorandum by counties vividly portraying the need for such supplemental direct relief from the Federal Government.

There being no objection, the letter from Mr. Zimmerman and the excerpt from the minutes of the State Executive Council of Minnesota and the accompanying memorandum were ordered to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

STATE RELIEF AGENCY,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BENSON: I am enclosing copy of a resolution passed by the Executive Council of the State of Minnesota at a recent meeting, petitioning the Federal Government to supplement direct relief in the State, to provide for the care of indigent Indians resident in the State of Minnesota.

In this connection your attention is respectfully directed to the fact that 85 percent of the Indian relief cases in the State are located in 10 of the more remote and less developed counties, there being resident approximately 9,000 Indians, about one-half of whom are on relief and will so remain.

To give you a clear picture of the situation, I am also enclosing a statement showing total population, number of Indian cases, Indian population, and percent of Indian cases to total relief cases compiled from the most recent figures available.

In view of the restricted State funds made available by the last special session of the legislature, allocation of State funds to the counties has been necessarily drastically reduced, which means that these undeveloped counties have found themselves in a position of being almost bankrupt.

Notwithstanding the restricted amount of State money available, the State Executive Council, fully realizing the untenable financial position of the counties, has made every effort possible to give these particular counties, whose need is so predominant, all the money possible, as evidenced by the allotments shown below:

	Percent
Becker County	41.0
Beltrami County	66.6
Cass County	77.3
Carlton County	45.5
Clearwater County	75.0
Cook County	60.5
Itasca County	58.9
Mahnomen County	68.1
Mille Lacs County	69.1
Redwood County	45.7

This State assistance is, of course, inadequate.

It is very definitely felt in the State of Minnesota, and we feel this viewpoint is held in the United States as a whole, that the Indians are, properly speaking, the very definite responsibility of the Federal Government; and we, therefore, request your earnest consideration of the matter to this end, that the Federal Government supplement relief granted Indians in the State by direct Federal grant to the State for distribution to the counties.

It is conservatively estimated, based on an allowance of $100 per Indian case for the remaining months of 1936, that approximately $105,000 of Federal funds are necessary.

May I have early advice of your reaction to this request?

Yours very truly,

STATE RELIEF AGENCY,
L. P. ZIMMERMAN, Administrator.

EXCERPTS FROM THE MINUTES OF THE MEETING OF THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL, APRIL 1, 1936

Whereas under the statutes of Minnesota, including Extra Session Laws 1935-36, chapter 101, appropriating money for emergency relief for the period ending July 1, 1937, the primary responsibility for the extension of relief is placed upon the counties of the State; and

Whereas in 10 of the more remote and less developed counties there being resident approximately 9,000 Indians, about one-half of whom are on relief and will so remain; and

Whereas the counties in which such Indians are so resident are reluctant to assume the responsibility of their care and are financially unable so to do; and

Whereas reliable reports indicate that there is considerable suffering among such Indians and that there is need for increased relief thereto, and such situation is becoming daily more serious; and

Whereas, in the opinion of the council, the problem of caring for such needy Indians is morally a national problem, instead of a State or local problem: Be it

Resolved by the Executive Council of the State of Minnesota at a regular meeting held this 1st day of April 1936, That the Federal Government be, and it is hereby, petitioned to supplement the relief which said counties and the State are able to provide for the care of such Indians with additional Federal funds; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Honorable John Collier, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and to each Senator and Representative in the Congress from this State.

MARGINS BETWEEN PRICES OF HOGS AND PRICES OF HOG PRODUCTS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter received by me from Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture. In this letter the Secretary takes exceptions to a statement made by me on the floor of the Senate on April 2 in the course of the debate on Senate bill 1424. In that statement I said:

The insufficiency of the information in the Department of Agriculture in respect to this subject is clearly indicated by the direct contradictions appearing in various public reports rendered to Congress and published, originating in the Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

Secretary Wallace believes that the following letter explains these apparent contradictions in regard to margins between prices paid farmers for live hogs and prices paid by consumers for the finished pork products. In the interest of clarification, I ask that Secretary Wallace's explanation be printed in the RECORD at this point.

I may add that column 4 of the table included in Secretary Wallace's letter shows the margin between hog prices at Chicago and retail prices at New York increased 7 cents between 1926 and 1932, while the margin between farm prices and retail prices at 51 cities decreased 67 cents in the same period. It is this difference in trends with which the Secretary's letter deals.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

APRIL 25, 1936.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: We have noted on page 4786 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, issued under the date of April 2, a statement by you in an address before the Senate to the effect that there is a direct contradiction in certain statistics appearing in two reports of this Department originating in the Bureau of Agricultural Economics. These statistics relate to margins between prices of hogs and prices of hog products. You cite data appearing in table 8 of a report submitted to the United States Senate, Seventy-second Congress, second session, entitled "Economic Situation of Hog Producers", and in tables 60 and 61 in Miscellaneous Publication No. 222 of the Department of Agriculture entitled "The Direct Marketing of Hogs."

We appreciate that your purpose in making this statement with reference to the Department's statistics was to call attention to the need for more adequate data in this field, especially with respect to operating margins of processors of livestock. Realizing the importance of more adequate statistics and because of my interest in improving our data wherever possible, I asked the Bureau of Agricultural Economics to check carefully the tables mentioned in order to determine whether the data were in fact as contradictory as your address implies. It appears on the basis of the information presented that you were misinformed with respect to the alleged inconsistency as between the tables and publications cited. The following explanation embodies the results of this effort to check the data carefully.

Attention is called to the fact that the tables cited include several margins, the different margins representing spreads between live-hog prices and wholesale prices of hog products, between live-hog prices and retail prices, and between wholesale and retail prices. Moreover, these spreads are based upon prices for different markets and, in some instances, for somewhat different products, depending upon the availability of data at the different marketing points and reflecting differences in price trends of different products derived from hogs.

Because of the need for data showing the spread between prices of live animals and wholesale and retail meat prices, the Department some years ago, through its Market News Service, began compiling data for comparing the price of hogs at Chicago, the most important market in the country, with wholesale and retail prices of hog products in New York City, the largest consuming center. Realizing, however, that the New York City market does not afford adequate data for price comparisons with respect to all products derived from the live animal, a further study was made to determine the difference between prices of live hogs and wholesale prices of all products in Chicago, which, as you know, is our principal meat-packing center and wholesale market for these products. Although New York is the largest consuming center, as a wholesale market for hog products it is not as important as Chicago. The Department's statistical series showing the wholesale value of hog products at Chicago, therefore, represents practically all the products derived from live hogs, whereas the two series showing wholesale and retail values of hog products for New York represent a lesser but, nevertheless, a major part of total hog products.

Even with these data for New York and Chicago, it was realized that we still lacked statistics showing the spread between prices received by farmers for hogs and the retail price of hog products for the United States as a whole over a long period of years. Consequently, a comparison was made of the United States average farm price of hogs and retail values of the principal edible hog products for the period from 1910 to date. In this study the retail value of hog products was computed on the basis of the retail prices compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics as a part of the Cost of Living series.

In the tables to which you refer five different margins or spreads between hog prices and values of hog products are given. These margins represent different things. In order that the distinctions between the various margins may be clearly indicated, we have brought together in a table below the data on these five margins.

Spread between price of hogs and wholesale and retail values of hog products

Year	(1) Price per 100 pounds of hogs at Chicago and wholesale value of 70.94 pounds of hog products at Chicago [1]	(2) Price per 100 pounds of hogs at Chicago and wholesale value of 53.78 pounds of hog products at New York [2]	(3) Retail value of 52.64 pounds of hog products at New York and wholesale value of 53.78 pounds of hog products at New York [3]	(4) Price of hogs per 100 pounds at Chicago and retail value of 52.64 pounds of hog products at New York [3]	(5) United States average farm price of hogs per 100 pounds and retail value of 52.64 pounds of hog products, 51 cities [3]
1924	$2.78	$1.53	$3.19	$4.72	$5.46
1925	3.25	1.55	2.90	4.45	4.11
1926	3.84	1.92	3.56	5.48	4.30
1927	3.65	2.28	3.37	5.65	5.27
1928	3.50	2.03	3.73	5.76	5.49
1929	3.08	1.64	2.87	4.51	5.00
1930	3.55	2.05	2.23	4.28	5.00
1931	3.40	2.60	2.18	4.78	5.75
1932	2.37	2.01	2.78	4.79	4.79

[1] Taken from report on The Direct Marketing of Hogs.
[2] Taken from Economic Situation of Hog Producers.
[3] Value of 52.64 pounds of hog products based on Bureau of Labor Statistics prices of hog products at 51 cities. United States farm price of hogs from Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

In the foregoing table the data in column 1 represent the margin between the price of hogs and the wholesale value of 71 pounds of hog products derived from 100 pounds of hogs. The margin in column 2 of the table is the spread between the price of hogs at Chicago and the wholesale value of 53.78 pounds of hog products at New York. This quantity includes only the principal hog products, namely, bacon, hams, picnics, loins, and lard. Column 3 shows the margin between the retail value of 52.64 pounds of hog products at New York and the wholesale value of 53.78 pounds of hog products at the same city. The 52.64 pounds for which the retail value was taken represents the yield of products which retailers are able to sell to consumers from the 53.78 pounds of products bought by them from the wholesaler. In other words, about 1 pound is lost in shrink and trimmings. Column 4 shows the spread between the retail value of 52.64 pounds of hog products at New York and the price of 100 pounds of live hogs at Chicago, and in column 5 the spread is that between the retail value of 52.64 pounds of hog products at 51 cities and the average farm price of hogs in the United States. In computing the retail value of hog products for 51 cities and the retail and wholesale values of hog products at New York only the principal products were included, since price data were not available for the minor products. It should be noted that in computing the wholesale value of 53.78 pounds of hog products it was only necessary to secure prices on the five principal products. In order to compute the wholesale value of 71 pounds of hog products it was necessary to compile prices of 22 specific hog products.

Comparison of the wholesale or packer margins between different markets shown in columns 1 and 2 of the table above for the period 1924–32 indicates that yearly changes in these margins were similar in direction in all years but two and that the relative changes were approximately the same for the two series most of the time. Such differences as appear are due to the fact that in some years the fluctuations in the value of the minor products, which are included in the value used for computing this spread shown in column 1 and not included in that for column 2, were relatively different from the changes in the value of principal products, which are included in the values used in computing both spreads shown in the two columns.

While columns 4 and 5 of the above table show the total spread between hog prices and the retail value of hog products, it should be recognized that these prices represent widely different situations. The hog price represented by column 4 is the price of live hogs at a specific market, Chicago, and the retail price in that column is the price compiled by our Market News Service in a specific consuming center, New York City. The retail price in column 5, on the other hand, is a general average of retail prices throughout the United States for certain cuts of meat which are compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and the average farm price of hogs is the price received by producers throughout the United States as compiled by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

In your address you stated that, commencing in 1926, one set of data showed a decline, whereas another set showed an increase in the same margin. Your statement is not entirely clear as to which sets of data you were comparing. It is possible that you were comparing the data shown in column 1 of the above table with the data shown in column 4. Because of the fact that 1926 is cited as the year in which the alleged inconsistency began, it seems likely that a comparison of year-to-year changes was made. If this was the case, attention is called to the fact that the data appearing in column 1 represent the price of live hogs in Chicago compared with the wholesale price of hog products in the same market. It would be correct to call this a wholesale or packer margin. The data in column 4, while showing a trend in the opposite direction from that of the data in column 1 for the 2 years following 1926, do not represent packer margins, but they represent the spread between the farm price of hogs and the United States average retail price of hog products, as explained previously. The two series of data, therefore, are not comparable.

If, on the other hand, your statement was intended to compare the long-time trend of the data in column 1 from 1926 to 1932 with the long-time trend of the data in column 4 for the same period, the general trend of the two series is in the same direction, namely, downward. If the comparison were made of the trends of the data shown in columns 4 and 5, it appears that the changes in the data in these two columns were substantially in the same direction from year to year throughout the period following 1926. They are therefore not inconsistent, especially when account is taken of the fact that they represent widely different situations, as explained above. One represents the spread between the price of hogs at Chicago and the retail value of hog products at New York City, and the other represents the spread between the average farm price of hogs in the United States and the retail value of hog products in 51 cities widely scattered throughout the country.

Changes in the United States average price of both hogs and hog products may be different in relative amount and directions from those in an individual market because of conditions peculiar to that market. For this reason it does not necessarily follow that changes in the total spread shown in column 4 should be equal in amount or always similar in direction to changes in the total spread shown in column 5. It will be observed, however, in comparing these two spreads that in all years but one or two the direction of change in the two margins was the same and that in some years the amount of change in the two margins was of about equal proportions.

Another point which should be recognized in making comparisons of the several margins is that the total spread between the price paid producers for hogs and the price paid by consumers for hog products is the sum of both the packer's or wholesaler's margin and the retailer's margin. These two margins can and do fluctuate independently of each other, and since each is a part of the total spread the fluctuations of the total spread are determined by the sum of the fluctuations of the two parts which compose it. For this reason changes in the total spread are not necessarily in the same direction or in the same amount as the changes in one or the other of the two parts which make up the total.

As your address indicates, the whole question relating to margins between livestock prices and prices of livestock products is of vital concern to livestock producers, and we are devoting considerable attention and study to it. The Bureau of Agricultural Economics is now securing prices of a greater number of livestock products than formerly, and also the number of markets for which prices are being secured has been increased. We appreciate also, as you point out, that our information and statistics with respect to such margins are in many cases insufficient, and we are desirous of securing more complete information as far as our resources permit. We do not believe, however, that there is in the data in the tables cited by you the contradiction which your statement implies. We should appreciate it if you would have this letter inserted into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that an appropriate explanation of the apparent inconsistency will be readily available to those interested.

Sincerely yours,

H. A. WALLACE, Secretary.

THOMAS HOOKER AND THE FIRST CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD as part of today's proceedings of the Senate a statement which I have prepared on Thomas Hooker and the First Constitutional Government.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THOMAS HOOKER—THE FIRST CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT

Three hundred years ago, in June 1636, Thomas Hooker, pastor of the church of Newton, Mass. (now called Cambridge), led his congregation out of the Massachusetts Bay Colony to the valley of the Connecticut River—heralding that mighty westward movement which was to continue for two centuries to the shores of the Pacific. His followers, numbering not more than 100, carrying their household goods on wagons, and driving before them 160 head of cattle and a few other animals, tramped through the 100 miles of wilderness between the Charles and the Connecticut Rivers for 2 weeks. A weary journey, yet with ample compensation in the natural beauties of early June in New England and in freedom from the rigors of the "aristocracy of righteousness" they left behind. A little band, yet they established the settlement of Hartford, generally acknowledged, and definitely referred to by Johnston (Connecticut, A Study of a Commonwealth-Democracy) as the birthplace of American democracy.

Born in England about 1586, Hooker's life seems to reflect a rising spirit of what Cotton Mather so aptly characterized as a "conscientious nonconformity." By 1630 this attitude toward the traditional rigidity of the church had gained for him the ill will of Laud, the Archbishop of Canterbury, to the extent that he was forced to leave England and flee to Holland. This driving spirit brought him later to the shores of New England and finally to the Connecticut Valley.

The migration of the congregation of the Newton church to Hartford arose out of a fundamental difference in attitude toward the principles of government between Hooker and his followers and those in control of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. On May 31, 1638, exactly 2 years after the departure from Massachusetts, Hooker preached his now famous sermon in Hartford, which embodied the principles incorporated thereafter in the fundamental orders. John Winthrop is characterized by James Truslow Adams in his recent book, The Living Jefferson, as one of the ablest, gentlest, and best of the colonists in the bay colony. Yet even he was engaged in an attempt to keep political control in the hands of his own small group. In fact, he felt that "democracy is among civil nations accounted the meanest and worst of all forms of government." It was against this fundamental spirit, so constantly reflected in the Massachusetts Bay Colony, where it was necessary to be a church member to vote, that Hooker rebelled. The outline of the significant sermon, transcribed from the shorthand notes of Henry Wolcott, Jr., of Windsor, follows. Note that the text is taken from Deuteronomy 1:13.

"Deuteronomy 1:13: Take you wise men, and understanding, and known among your tribes, and I will make them rulers over you. Captains over thousands, and captains over hundreds, over fifties, over ten, etc.

"Doctrine I. That the choice of public magistrates belongs unto the people, by God's own allowance.

"Doctrine II. The privilege of election, which belongs to the people, therefore must not be exercised according to their humors, but according to the blessed will and law of God.

"III. They who have power to appoint officers and magistrates, it is in their power, also, to set the bounds and limitations of the power and place unto which they call them.

"Reasons: 1. Because the foundation of authority is laid, firstly, in the free consent of the people.

"2. Because, by a free choice, the hearts of the people will be more inclined to the love of the persons chosen and more ready to yield obedience.

"3. Because of that duty and engagement of the people.

"Uses: The lesson taught is threefold:

"First. There is the matter of thankful acknowledgment in the appreciation of God's faithfulness toward us, and the permission of these measures that God doth command and vouchsafe.

"Secondly. Of reproof—to dash the councils of all those that shall oppose it.

"Thirdly. Of exhortation—to persuade us, as God hath given us liberty, to take it.

"And, lastly, as God hath spared our lives, and given us them in liberty, so to seek the guidance of God, and to choose in God and for God."

Here, simply, but with infinite conviction, is expressed the germ of the American Commonwealth. Indeed, as one commentator has said, "If the germ is potentially, the whole development; that is, the most important profession of political faith in our history." Here we see the first practical public emphasis on the rights of the people to choose their own rulers and to limit the powers of those rulers—the first intimation of government "of the people, by the people, for the people." Here also is warning of the responsibility which such right of choice involves. The people must elect not "according to their humours, but according to the blessed will and law of God."

This seed of our democratic Government was developed into a written Constitution in 1639 by representatives of those who heard this sermon, and by certain others. Approximately coincident with the departure of Hooker and his small group from the Bay colony had been similar migrations from Dorchester to what is now Windsor, Conn., and from Watertown to the present Wethersfield. These three towns which, almost from the time of their establishment in the Bay colony, had been "nonconformist", were well suited to the responsibility of drawing up the written document which may be regarded as the "first instance of a written constitution."

In 1639 representatives from these three towns met at Hartford and, probably under the direct guidance of Hooker, there drew up the 11 fundamental orders. The significance of this document is reflected by James Bryce in the American Commonwealth, where he calls it "the oldest truly political constitution in America." John Fiske, in The Beginnings of New England, says that this document was the first written constitution known to history which created a government. And, indeed, I know that many agree that the Government of the United States today is directly related in lineal descent to the one formed on that historic occasion in Connecticut. For, while the compact drawn up in the cabin of the Mayflower is a document defining and limiting the functions of government, and the Magna Carta was of the nature of a constitution as far as it went, the fundamental orders created a government!

At this time, when we are especially remembering Thomas Jefferson, whose words, "Governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed", may still be read in the Declaration of Independence, it is interesting to suggest his forerunner in Hooker, who said, "The foundation of authority is laid * * * in the full consent of the people."

So today it seems only fitting that we, the representatives of the Nation at the seat of the United States Government, should join the city of Hartford in paying tribute to Thomas Hooker, minister, statesman, friend, and counselor of the people—father of American democracy. W. S. Archibald calls him "a great minister and a great citizen." Tall, strong of physique, upright, yet not rigid, morally he was respected and admired even by those who differed with him. I think we can devise no more fitting tribute than that expressed by John Winthrop, with whom Hooker was in constant disagreement politically, who wrote of him in 1647, at the time of his death, as—

"That faithful servant of the Lord, * * * pastor of the church in Hartford, who, for piety, prudence, wisdom, zeal, learnings, and what else might make him serviceable in the place and time he lived in, might be compared with men of greatest note; and he shall need no other praise: the fruits of his labors in both Englands shall preserve an honorable and happy remembrance of him forever."

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT-GENERAL OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the printing in full in the RECORD the address of Mrs. William A. Becker, president-general, at the Forty-fifth Continental Congress of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, on April 20, 1936.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Members of the Forty-fifth Continental Congress and friends: It is indeed a privilege, as your chosen leader, to welcome you to our beautiful Constitution Hall. You have come from every section of our country, from its highways and its byways, and from countries beyond the seas, and here—once more assembled—you bring your gifts of service to our great society. Heartiest greetings to one and all, and to those who in their distant homes are united with us through the invisible magic of the air, magic indeed—as great as any known to Alice in her Wonderland. Ours is truly a modern wonderland, ready and waiting to respond to the will of a mighty people, dedicated to love of country and to humanity.

Spring is here with its hope and promise, stimulating us with renewed purpose to faithfully carry on. America is the child of a great ideal, born of a vision in the hearts and wills of a sturdy people. Faith in God and in themselves brought men to these shores to build a new world. Like magic has our country grown great, strong, and prosperous. But magic works only so long as one holds the key to her secrets.

Yesterday we celebrated the one hundred and sixty-first anniversary of the firing of "the shot heard 'round the world"—the shot which announced to all peoples that the new world would be free—free to build the land of promise, free to fulfill the vision of its dreams.

Our ancestors knew that freedom entails responsibilities. They gave of their all for the faith that was in them. They knew that the long struggle which lay before them for liberty would set high value on human rights; they knew that constant vigilance was the price of freedom; and withal they visioned a better world. There was a time when the average man knew only stern duties and little of personal rights. Only gradually grew the vision that the success of any system of government depends upon a proper balance between rights and duties. Feudalism served its age as long as the overlord gave protection and security to those who served him. But the higher ideal was realized only when the law of compensation was recognized as the equal of authority with obligations. The observance of duties depends either upon compulsion or conscience. In a real democracy arbitrary compulsion should be lacking. But when conscience becomes dulled by the lack of religion and by the urge of grim necessity, danger is at hand.

Under the ideal condition, freedom to pursue happiness within the law, with all its rights and privileges—the right to security, the right to peace, the right to choose one's objective in life, the right to have work, the right of relief—all these privileges should be secure.

Unless there is a reawakened sense of responsibility, the balance is lost and democracy cannot live. Force would then assert itself for the attainment of those essentials which mankind must enjoy. The magic key lies buried in the cornerstone of this Republic—the character of her people, the principles of freedom, equality, justice, and humanity which remain her dream.

Great changes have come about in the character of our people. Millions of the oppressed and discontented of all lands have flocked to these shores, bringing new concepts, new traditions, and new demands. Indifference and greed are responsible for the coming of hordes unassimilated, un-Americanized, underprivileged, discontented, knowing only the rule of force.

Democracy being dependent upon those disciplined in self-control—the essential of self-government—those peoples, unprepared for the exercise of these duties, have not found democracy possible. Germany, long ruled by an iron hand, was a prosperous empire; a failure under democracy. Now vast numbers of people, lately released from the iron hand of European autocracy, are looking for strong leadership to point the way. In our country education is the answer. Vigilance is the price. Service is the opportunity.

The Society of the D. A. R. was founded not only to preserve historic monuments and colonial history, but to maintain the highest ideals of the founders of the Republic. National preservation through patriotic education is our essential program. Worthy citizenship is our watchword. As the responsibilities of true citizenship are again engendered in the minds of our people, the problems now facing us must disappear. Without character, without service, without religion, there is salvation neither for the individual nor for the Nation. Have we the vision to meet the problems of our day?

What are these problems? We are accused of a desire to maintain the status quo, of dealing death blows to personal freedom, of ignoring the principles upon which our Nation was founded, of unduly emphasizing excessive militarism. Let us then restate our faith in America's dream, the bringing of equal opportunity to every man, justice and humanity, freedom to live secure in the possession of property, home and family, and liberty to worship God according to the dictates of conscience. For the ultimate attainment of these ends no charter of government offers such security as does the Constitution of the United States.

The young woman who complains that so low a wage as $10 a week is driving youth to communism does not realize that under communism she would be compelled to keep her underpaid job, while in the United States she may turn without interference to a better job when opportunity offers. Youth without employment, without hope for the future, without prospect of marriage and a home, without knowledge of the principles of their government and its source of constitutional authority is lured by the call of revolt.

Starvation wages, unequal opportunity, uncertainty of justice, neglect of youth, disregard for law, lynchings, malfeasance in office, all these are blots upon our civilization—are challenges to our faith in our national ideals.

These challenges abound in every community. Our local governments must be made honest and above reproach; protection must be assured for the small industrialist, welcome given responsible trade unions, decent living conditions assured, education and recreational centers provided for all. But have we the will to achieve, the vision to carry on? We must have knowledge of the faith that is in us, must possess the "magic key", must dedicate ourselves anew to the service of God and country if America's dream is to come true.

In days of old the great prophets were guided by visions. God's call to Isaiah was answered by an unflinching "Here I am; send me." Ezekiel, gazing into the valley of dry bones, knew that they would live again. Daniel visioned salvation for his people. Saul, on the way to Damascus, heard the voice of God, and arose Paul, the great Apostle. Our Pilgrim Fathers were led by visions to a new land. The men who framed our Constitution envisioned a nation dedicated to the common welfare. Today we still have the vision, we believe and know that the attainment of these objectives lies in the hands of our people if they will but awaken and so dedicate themselves.

The hope of all nations lies in their youth. Old is the saying, "Give me the child until he is 8, and I will show you the man." The child, hardly beyond his mother's knee, is already molded in the form which will influence his entire life. Can we not revive in the mothers of our land a keener sense of responsibility for the faith, the love, and the devotion to service that should actuate the lives of our children, our future citizens?

Faith in the goodness of things, joy in service and obedience to authority should be the ideal of every child; his daily life one of unfolding accommodation to living, playing, and working with others, to learning consideration and protection for the weak, and to the development of his own powers as a valuable contribution to the life of all.

Decent homes are necessary, adequate food and clothing. Let us remember that many of our foremost citizens came from humble homes of poverty, but homes directed by honest and God-fearing people. Luxury and ease are often handicaps to children unless hand in hand with a strong sense of responsibility. Love of country is as natural as love of a nation's heroes—heroes of peace as well as of war.

Each community is responsible for its children and should provide outlets for their energies and needs. In some communities the church still ministers to unfortunate families, provides homes for neglected children and for the aged. Would that the people of every community felt these to be their special privileges.

Get closer to the children, know what they are thinking, what they are learning, in school and on the street. Insist upon teachers who know what America stands for and who believe in her high ideals. America is still free to train her children as she will.

The very vastness of the need today is a challenge and a pledge that there is work for all to do. See that youth is prepared and he will find his place. The young dream ardently and impulsively, lacking the wisdom born of experience. Any program for youth must have a challenge—be alluring, dramatic, consuming. It must appeal to the heart, furnish individual initiative and define a task to be done. Restless youth can no longer ship before the mast, or carve new fortunes out of the West. But there are greater adventures near at hand.

A study of summer camps erected by the Communist groups will reveal an intense and exciting program attractive to youth. Can we not give direction to youth that will fire him with equal zeal and also furnish him with a congenial task which he can perform? We cannot relinquish our place to the builders of class hatred, to the destroyers of the very woof and fiber of our best traditions. I maintain that the opportunity is ours if we have the vision and the will to give freely of ourselves and of our resources. And I have confidence that this can be done.

The Chicago Boys' Clubs have an enviable record for citizen initiative, and prove that wholesome recreation acts as a deterrent to crime; add to this a definite program of activity calling for initiative and a sense of usefulness and achievement, and what changed lives will follow!

In the most congested and underprivileged districts of Chicago the boys' clubs last year provided camps, contests, and supervised sports for 16,000 boys. During that time less than a dozen of their number got into trouble with the law. One of these clubs is in a district where 50 percent were formerly juvenile delinquents. Does this mean anything to us? The average cost per boy was $3 per year—one one-hundredth of the cost of keeping a boy in jail for the same period. But that is only the financial consideration. Who can estimate the moral and spiritual gain to the boy and to the Nation?

Ninety dollars will keep a child in school; $300 is the prison cost. We spend one and a half billions annually on detention and maintenance of prisoners, only two hundred millions less than it costs to educate 26,000,000 school children. Thirteen billions a year, or $22,800 every minute, is the estimated tax laid unofficially by crime on the people of the United States—its only return being "bigger and better."

Thirteen billion dollars. Twice what the Federal Government spent in 1935. Can there be any logic in spending more for crime than is being expended for education and for the development of what is best in youth?

Five boys recently sentenced to 243 years for shooting a shopkeeper will cost the State $100,000 if they serve their full term. Is it not an indictment of our intelligence that we permit these conditions to exist when it is so clearly demonstrated what we might be doing for the betterment of youth had we the vision and the will?

We who are here today know of lives shattered and health ruined by the World War, we know of a generation handicapped by the loss of its ideals and of its youth; we see the world the poorer for it. Today our problem concerns another generation of youth. Are they, also, destined to be lost, for lack of vision and want of leadership?

In the year 1930 America had 6,000,000 young people between the ages of 14 and 24 who were out of school and with no work. The number is larger today. Between the ages of 18 and 20 alone, 3,000,000 are unable to find employment, and unable or unwilling to attend school or college.

They are speaking of themselves as the lost generation. Can this condition be permitted to continue? Not if we have the vision.

Bewildered and discouraged and lacking knowledge of fundamentals, youth offers fertile soil for the shrewd propaganda of dangerous social and political theorists, who lose no opportunity for sowing the deadly seeds of discontent and revolution. These propagandists have work for everyone, also an ample fund from which to provide for scores of companions in revolt. If we are to be fortified against a youth movement which may destroy our "treasure chest" of sacred ideals and set civilization back unknown ages, let American citizens look to their homes and their communities, and be swift to provide character training and occupation for their youth.

The C. C. C. camps have been an untold blessing to our land, offering food, shelter, and constructive work to homeless youth, while providing relief for his or another needy family. A marvelous concept put into ready action by the preparedness of our peace army. A chance to work, a chance to play, and a chance to dream, with faith in those about him, and the gangster's halo quickly fades.

Boy and Girl Scouts, community clubs, our own C. A. R. chapters, Girl Homemakers, and Sons and Daughters of the United States of America furnish opportunity for initiative and leadership if only we have the vision of the America of our dreams.

Much community betterment could be brought about by youth organized for local service under inspired leadership.

Of leadership we have great need, for much is required of a leader today. Tact and grace and understanding are vital, as are also selflessness in service and ability to unite workers for a common cause and for the common good. Leadership in children is frequently manifest at an early age. It should be intelligently directed and tenderly guarded. Our country has need of them.

Training in statesmanship is quite as vital as training for citizenship. Service to the State should be a life profession expertly trained. The State Department guards the Nation's welfare and promotes just dealing with other nations. Should this Department fail, the Army stands ready to restore the peace. A training school comparable to West Point or to Annapolis should train citizens in the affairs of nations. The Bonar Law School, founded in England in 1929, provides young Englishmen with training in diplomacy and statesmanship. A sound foreign policy can be based only on an understanding of the problems and purposes of other nations.

It is regrettable that the cause of peace has suffered by well-intentioned, impractical zealots who would disarm their own country as "an example to the world." They encourage youth to have "conscientious scruples" against the defense of country; they advocate the abolition of military training camps; they shut their eyes to the world as it is, and believe that disarmament would assure peace to America; they unite with those who would disarm America first and to make her destruction sure.

National defense is the peace policy of the D. A. R. We believe in an Army, a Navy, and an Air Corps adequate to the needs of the Nation and in keeping with the acts of Congress. "To provide for the common defense" is one of the prime purposes of Federal Government. We rejoice that the present Congress has seen fit to make appropriations in keeping with the programs for an efficient Army and an adequate Navy. Years of neglect, while we hoped and vainly waited for reduction in the forces of other countries, are responsible for our programs of today. America is not and never has been a militaristic Nation. She has worked diligently for better understanding and the amicable settlement of disagreements. She must be prepared to defend herself and to keep alive her principles against enemies without, as well as those within her gates.

Misled youth of today is pledging itself never to fight for country; it is lending ear to those who say democracy has failed—there must be a new social order. Under the leadership of elements positively opposed to our constitutional government youth all over this country is demonstrating what they call as "peace strike." On Wednesday of this week they march out of their classrooms to show what they will do if their country ever calls them to the service of the Stars and Stripes. Their protest this year is particularly directed against the Reserve Officers Training Corps, for they say that there cannot be real freedom for their program while an R. O. T. C. exists on a college campus.

I beg you to study their program—a program that cannot coexist with training and loyal defense of country—and help these youth of America. No ironical paradox is it (as some would have us believe) that the D. A. R. are opposing the revolution which radicals would force upon us today. Our ancestors, though leaders of the American Revolution, builded on firm foundations long in the laying; they builded carefully and well and destroyed nothing. The revolutionists of today would first destroy morals and religion (which they term the opiate of the people), then the whole fabric of constitutional government, while property and homes would follow in the discard. As distant as the North Pole from the South is their philosophy foreign to ours. We need this knowledge and by it set our course. Have we the vision? Have we the will to conquer?

Do we concede that democracy has failed; that our people can no longer govern themselves; that security is a surer goal than liberty? Are we ready for dictatorship under whatever name it may be termed? Because we see the nations of the world, one by one, reverting to type, do we need to fear for democracy? America's sacred heritage, her "treasure chest", is freedom, is faith in God and fellow man. Let us be true to the type of our ancestors. Let the hardihood, the vision, and the will that made justice and equal opportunity the watchwords of every household find root again in millions of American homes. Let every community accept responsibility for its citizens; let America dream again of the great humanities, which alone can save her and reawaken zeal to labor for her ideals.

Read the Epic of America by James Truslow Adams, and, catching the vision, do not let it go, "a land in which life shall be better and richer and fuller for every man, with opportunity for each according to his ability and achievement."

Larger conceptions, deeper convictions, definite goals are our needs today. We must not, dare not, let them go! We need to ask ourselves simply and seriously what we are living for. We have received a great inheritance. What are we doing with it? Can we return a hundred percent on our trust, or are we going to be fearful and lose that which we have gained?

Pericles aptly said: "It is not that they, the heroic dead, secure in their immortality, need temple or column to perpetuate their fame or regard their virtues, but because, through admiration of what is heroic, men rise to higher levels." Have we, perchance, cultivated the spirit of things and neglected the things of the spirit? Much we have worshiped has turned and betrayed us. How is the Nation to use its bounties? Great possessions entail grave responsibility.

Issues today are beyond the purely economic. They affect the fundamental concepts of government, of society, of democracy, of liberty. Somehow we must hear all sides of a question and have the vision to see through the clouds.

Washington visioned a united people. Jefferson visioned the dignity and perfectability of the individual. Emerson pointed out that the antidote to all the failures of government is "in the growth and strength of the individual—in the substance of his character, in his ideals and his will. To develop the individual the state exists, and as he is so is the state."

Not in material wealth nor in fertile fields, but in the quality of its manhood and its womanhood is a nation great.

We have pledged ourselves to a program for youth. This old world is crying aloud for the things of the spirit, for first things first. A nation founded on things of the spirit needs but to catch the vision of the gifts that are here, of the heights still to be scaled, of the opportunities that still remain.

America, the land of opportunity! So visioned by the brave men and women who (out of a wilderness) carved this new land! So cherished by the signers of the Declaration of Independence! So destined by the framers of our Constitution and all who on its principles have builded a Nation that is still the hope of the world!

America still the land of opportunity if we but have the vision and the will!

Without vision the people perish.

TELL THE PEOPLE—EDITORIAL BY WILLIAM E. CHILTON

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Charleston Gazette, under the heading "Tell the People", which was written by a former distinguished Member of this body, Hon. William E. Chilton.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Charleston (W. Va.) Gazette of Apr. 26, 1936]

TELL THE PEOPLE

Were they living today, Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, Abraham Lincoln, Woodrow Wilson, William Jennings Bryan—all the leaders of the people, who, we feel, studied history, human nature, and the movements of people in groups and as individuals, would have their battles to fight over, upon the progressive principles which they fairly burned into the political thought of their times. The difference would be only in the details, the weapons, and the battleground. "Truth crushed to earth will rise again." It cannot be so deeply buried as to prevent resurrection nor so badly whipped as to deaden its eternal spirit and purpose.

Till May 12 the two leading political parties—and until the November general election, the voters will be facing efforts to evade or to accept, to deny or to recognize, to obscure or to proclaim, to crush or to enthrone the handmaid of justice, truth. In the language of the poet, "He is the freeman whom the truth makes free."

If you chafe at the "preacher" tone of these remarks, let us remind you that this is the supreme occasion for serious reflection, lest the bad plight from which the country is recovering at rapid strides be precipitated upon us again and we be relegated to that field of want, depression, doubt, and uncertainty upon which we turned our backs 4 years ago.

Now, let us consider the undisputed facts. It will be impossible for the Republican Party to destroy the New Deal, even should it accomplish the improbable—elect a President. Now, the Senate is two-thirds Democratic; besides, there are listed as Republicans such men as JOHNSON, LA FOLLETTE, and NORRIS, who agree with the progressive policies of Roosevelt and have given support to the principles of the New Deal. It thus can be seen from a plain statement of the facts that a change of Presidents now would throw the country into that most unfortunate of all governmental situations, to wit, a President of one political party without a Congress to back anything which that new President might want to do; on the contrary, a Congress committed against him. Congress, we must keep in mind, consists of both a Senate and House, and even if the Republicans should carry the House—a very improbable eventuality—nothing affirmative could be hoped for with a Senate alined as it is now; and the time spent from March 1933 to January 1937, when the new President would come in, will have then appeared merely as a target for the gunner's greed.

We are always assuming that the voters of the United States have their eyes to the future and their faces to the front. But let us suppose that the Republicans should carry the next Presidency and both branches of Congress. We are wondering whether or not there is any candidate for public office who will answer the following queries now in the minds of the people:

1. Would they abandon the effort to feed the children, women, and men who, without help from the Government, must suffer?

2. Will any of these candidates say frankly to the people that they favor and will support a program of repealing all of the New Deal measures upon the ground that they are erroneous or unconstitutional? To put it another way, the Supreme Court having held that it has the power to decide and declare that an activity of the people is exclusively a State matter, as the Court did in the A. A. A. decision, would any candidate on the side opposed to Roosevelt be in favor of declaring void, or repealing by legislative enactment, any of the New Deal laws which come under the aforesaid category? These are natural, pertinent questions for the people to pass upon if the criticisms of candidates in the field and the voluntary advisers, such as the Liberty League, mean what may be fairly deduced from their utterances. A criticism which does not mean a purpose toward betterment is a waste of words.

3. Will any of the candidates now wearing out shoe leather, consuming gasoline, and straining vocal chords in criticism, come down definitely to ground on any feature of the New Deal and declare for its repeal, or for urging the Supreme Court to declare it unconstitutional? Laws affecting labor, housing, improvement of navigable rivers and using those improvements for flood control, helping the unemployed, the homeless, and the helpless, are these under the ban? Who will so commit himself? Will any of the aforesaid critics come out definitely against the guaranty of bank deposits? Will any of them come out and declare in favor of putting gold back to the point where it was when Mr. Hoover was President, and turning the more than ten billions of gold which President Roosevelt has locked up back into general circulation, so that the real authors of war, the speculators in gold, can bring on war by means as old as political and money kings?

It is a fact, demonstrated by the current diplomatic events in Europe, that any kind of a general war in Europe is now almost impossible, because the international financiers, who make money out of war, will not give consent so long as at least half of the money gold of the world is withdrawn from this secret manipulation of money for selfish purposes. Oh, what a big question this is. The people do not want war; and who does not know that the European nations cannot fight unless the financiers of war profiteers and the remnants of old royal families can speculate and get gold.

Think over the retired royal families of Europe. Take the English house of Stuart, the last reigning member of which was Queen Ann, who died in 1714, when a new line of kings, beginning with George I, took the throne of England. This old Stuart family got a haven in France under the Bourbon kings. It had two pretenders, the old and the young. The young pretender fought the great Battle of Culloden and lost, but the family is still organized and very recently had a meeting of that clan in London; and they have resources. The Kings of Spain, who were abolished by that country, have great resources, so have the claimants to the throne of France, under different houses; they all have money or resources. The house of Hohenzollern is organized and has vast resources. There are many other royal families in Europe who are organized and keep up the old custom of having dukes, earls, landgraves, counts, and so on. They have nothing that is valuable to humanity but patience.

If these royal claimants, all of them, conspiring against government by the people, can get a chance to put their resources together and grab with it enough of the world's gold to finance war, there will be war sooner or later. They want gold so that they can live in any country while scheming for power.

Assuming that the people of the United States do not want war and do not relish anything that would either provoke war or encourage it, it can be seen that the policy of President Roosevelt regarding gold has been the greatest insurance policy for peace that has ever been devised by human government. It does not lessen the money in circulation in the United States, but it does hold gold for the time being away from the speculators in life and blood. Would any of the opposing candidates say that they are against the President's policy regarding gold, and that they would change the legislative and the Executive order which, while not decreasing the circulating medium of the United States, still holds that god of kings and royal families, of international financiers, and war profiteers in such a position that it cannot finance war. These pretenders to royal blood, claiming divine right to rule over unwilling people, know little about American finance, and they want money which they can hoard and that will be good in any land of Europe at any time. This is a mere obsession of royalty and big financiers. Our Supreme Court has settled that question for this country, as the Constitution in clear words provides. Money in this country is what Congress says shall be money, and the United States is free from the superstition that gold is natural money.

When the American people think, as we believe they are thinking now, and consider that all the money gold in the world is not sufficient to pay 1 year's interest, at 4 percent, on the private debts of the people of the United States, and the debts of the National Government, the States, counties, and municipal corporations, they will easily comprehend that the gold standard, as understood by Mr. Hoover, Mr. Coolidge, and Mr. Harding, would put this country in the helpless position of having to pay in money which does not exist and cannot be obtained.

We now ask the question, Would any of the critics of Mr. Roosevelt, or those who are demanding a change and are candidates for office, come out and declare that they would wipe out the legislation and the Executive orders of the present administration which have freed the American people from the slavery of gold, at least during the process of business recovery? Who is so bold as to commit himself to that old policy of monarchs that made gold the regulator of the prices of commodities and the wages of labor?

CATASTROPHE RELIEF LOANS BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD information furnished by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in reference to the method of obtaining loans for people who have been affected by the recent floods.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INFORMATION REGARDING CATASTROPHE RELIEF LOANS

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, pursuant to the provisions of Public, No. 160, Seventy-third Congress, approved April 13, 1934, as amended, is authorized, through such existing agency or agencies as it may designate, to make loans to corporations, partnerships, or individuals, municipalities, or political subdivisions of States or their public agencies, including public-school boards and public-school districts, and water, irrigation, sewer, drainage, and flood-control districts for the purpose of financing the repair, construction, reconstruction, or rehabilitation of structures or buildings, including such equipment, appliances, fixtures, machinery, and appurtenances as shall be deemed necessary or appropriate by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and for the purpose of financing the repair, construction, reconstruction, or rehabilitation of water, irrigation, gas, electric, sewer, drainage, flood-control, communication, or transportation systems, highways, and bridges damaged or destroyed by earthquake, conflagration, tornado, cyclone, hurricane, flood, or other catastrophe in the years 1935 or 1936, and for the purpose of financing the acquisition of structures, buildings, or property, real and personal, in replacement of structures, buildings, groins, jetties, bulkheads, or property, real and personal, destroyed or rendered unfit for use by reason of the catastrophe, when such repair, construction, reconstruction, rehabilitation, or acquisition is deemed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to be useful or necessary, said loans to be so secured as reasonably to assure repayment thereof.

ELIGIBILITY

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation will consider applications for loans presented by individuals, partnerships, or corporations, or by municipalities, or political subdivisions of States or their public agencies, including public-school boards and public-school districts, and water, irrigation, sewer, drainage, and flood-control districts, for the purpose of financing the repair, construction, reconstruction, rehabilitation, or acquisition of structures, buildings, or property, as referred to in the preceding paragraph, damaged or destroyed by catastrophe in the years 1935 and 1936. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation will determine from the facts and circumstances in each particular case when rehabilitation is "useful or necessary", and under what circumstances the loan is "so secured as reasonably to assure repayment thereof."

AMOUNT

Loans will be limited to an amount reasonably required to accomplish the purposes for which they may be authorized.

SECURITY

The act authorizing Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make these loans requires that they shall be collateraled:

(a) In the case of loans for the acquisition, repair, construction, reconstruction, or rehabilitation of private real property, by the obligations of the owner of such property, secured by a lien thereon;

(b) In case of loans for the repair, construction, reconstruction, or rehabilitation of privately owned water, gas, electric, communication, or transportation systems, by the obligations of the owners of such water, gas, electric, communication, or transportation systems, secured by a lien thereon; and

In the case of loans in connection with personal property, the specific requirement in regard to collateral will be determined in each case as presented. The act requires that all such loans shall be so secured as reasonably to assure repayment thereof.

TERM OF LOAN

The collateral obligations shall have maturities not exceeding 10 years in case of loans made under subparagraph (a) above and not exceeding 20 years in case of loans under subparagraphs (b) and (c) above.

In the case of loans made in connection with personal property, the collateral obligations shall mature at such time or times as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may determine, and where not otherwise prescribed in the act, not later than January 31, 1945.

The interest rate will be 4 percent per annum.

The following sections of Public, No. 160, Seventy-third Congress, as amended, are applicable to loans referred to in this circular:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled 'An act authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to nonprofit corporations for the repair of damages caused by floods or other catastrophes, and for other purposes', approved April 13, 1934, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

POLITICS IN RELIEF

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Washington Post, by Dr. George Gallup, relating to politics in relief.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post]

POLITICS PLAYS A ROLE IN RELIEF, SAY VOTERS IN NATIONAL POLL—SOUTH AND FAR WEST DISAGREE WITH EAST—FIFTY-FIVE PERCENT THINK RESPONSIBILITY FOR AID SHOULD BE TURNED BACK TO STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS; 45 PERCENT SAY "NO"

By Dr. George Gallup

NEW YORK, April 25.—Approximately 6 out of every 10 Americans, on the average, think that politics influences the handling of Federal relief funds in their localities. Nearly half the people receiving relief admit it. A fair-sized majority of Democrats believe it. A huge majority of Republicans are convinced of it.

These facts were brought out by a nonpartisan, Nation-wide poll of all classes of voters which has just been completed by the American Institute of Public Opinion. Whether the voters are right or wrong in thinking that politics colors relief is no concern of the institute. Its poll simply shows that this is what the people of the country believe.

The question voted on by thousands of persons—Republicans and Democrats, rich and poor, farmers and city folk—in every State in the Union was this:

"In your opinion, does politics play a part in the handling of relief in your locality?"

"Yes", said 65 percent.
"No", said 18 percent.
"No opinion", said 17 percent.

Relief has been called the national issue. It affects everybody. To the needy and destitute it means life itself. From the rest of the population it means a steady drain of cash.

Relief, as everybody knows, has also become a bitterly partisan issue. The poll reported today reveals for the first time the extent of the split among the three regular parties.

Asked whether they thought politics influences the handling of relief in their own localities, voters of the three chief parties replied as follows:

	Yes	No	No opinion
Democrats—percent	55	25	20
Republicans—do	80	8	12
Socialists—do	77	9	14

Note that there is a difference of 25 points between the Democratic and Republican vote.

The Institute of Public Opinion also sounded out the opinion of those most concerned with this particular problem—persons on relief. It found that 49 percent—nearly half—believe there is politics in the handling of Federal donations, 25 percent did not think so, and 26 percent had no opinion.

OPINION FOUND UNIFORM

Opinion on the question of politics in relief is fairly uniform throughout the country. A majority of voters in every State of the Union, except Kentucky, voted "yes" when asked if they thought politics influenced Federal donations in their localities. The affirmative vote in the Southern States, which are known to be loyally Democratic, was in some instances higher than the vote of the New England States, which are Republican today. For instance, 83 percent of the poll voters in Arkansas said there was politics in relief, and 75 percent in Mississippi, whereas the comparable vote in Vermont was only 51 percent and in New Hampshire 63 percent.

More than half of the number of persons on Federal work relief live in 11 heavily populated States. These 11 States account for approximately 2,245,763 out of a total of 3,861,586 work-relief cases, or about 58 percent, according to figures recently released by the W. P. A. Here is how the 11 States with the largest number of cases voted in the poll today on the question of politics in relief:

FARM VOTE VERSUS CITY VOTE

One of the most interesting facts uncovered by today's poll was that voters in rural areas—in hamlets, on farms, and along the country roads—are more convinced than persons in urban areas that there is politics in relief. The rural vote affirming this belief was 70 percent, whereas the comparable vote for the 10 largest cities in the land averaged only 61 percent.

There may be several reasons for this. The first is that the farmer's gorge probably rises if he finds a "city slicker" in a nearby town receiving relief money without working. A second reason is that the rural population is likely to take a greater interest in what goes on in its locality than people in a busy, crowded city where families sometimes never meet their next-door neighbors. Hence the average citizen's opportunity for first-hand knowledge of relief methods is probably greater in the rural areas than in the big cities and if politics exists he will be quicker to spot it.

In previous polls conducted by the institute the young voters of the Nation have been pretty consistently pro-administration. In fact, the young vote is one of Mr. Roosevelt's chief sources of political strength and polls have shown that the Republicans must develop an appeal to this group (and others) if they hope to win. Today's poll indicates that relief may offer the G. O. P. a convenient handle for this purpose.

THE AMERICAN WAY FORWARD—ARTICLE BY JACKSON H. RALSTON

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, since the foundation of the Union, our system of taxation has always contrived to shift the burden from the privileged few to the backs of the consuming masses. It is a vital and threatening issue before the National Government and every State as well.

Judge Jackson H. Ralston, known and respected by many of us for many years as an authority and author upon international law, an able economist and sincere patriot, has written a short article on the tax situation in California which is of universal application and interest. It is titled "The American Way Forward", and I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN WAY FORWARD

By Jackson H. Ralston

What shall we do about the increasing tax burden?

We authorize our local, State, and Federal Governments to do a thousand things absolutely necessary to protect our lives, health, and property and care for the destitute, without which services civilization would collapse; services which private enterprise cannot and will not perform, but which cost money.

On the other hand, mounting taxes are proving ruinous to millions of farmers, workers, business and professional men; are hampering honest, constructive, individual enterprise; and are blocking recovery.

What is the practical answer to this impasse?

It is self-evident that every man should pay for the support of government in direct ratio to the cash and other benefits he receives from government. It is axiomatic that no man should be permitted to "pass on" his just taxes and make other men pay them.

No one will deny the justice of these propositions. Yet, this is exactly what our cleverly devised tax system has been doing for a century. We are now paying the disastrous penalty. The latest device to "shift" the tax load from the few to the many is a "sales tax."

In California this tax originally was 2½ percent on all sales with a promise that by June 1935 it would be reduced to 2 percent. That promise was violated. The tax is now 3 percent on all sales except gasoline, on which there is a special tax of 3 cents per gallon, and an exception of foodstuffs except when sold in restaurants.

PURPOSE AND EFFECT OF THE SALES TAX

As a matter of fact, the real purpose of this tax was to cut down the taxes of the wealthy on the plea that real estate was overburdened. How it has worked out is a matter of common knowledge. State Comptroller Riley, who ought to know, says, "There is some justification for the statement that this small home owner has not been helped to the same extent as the large landowner" and gives figures to prove it.

Again, Professor Staffelbach, director of research, California State Teachers Association, reported in January 1935:

"The general sales tax is a form of taxation which constitutes a 'throw-back' to forms of taxation which were in effect before the French Revolution, and which it took a revolution to overthrow. It is completely the reverse of the ability-to-pay theory, in that it taxes poverty and tends to exempt wealth and ability to pay. * * *

"Citizen A and citizen B pay exactly the same percentage sales tax. Citizen A is forced to spend all of his $1,000 income; therefore he pays a tax on his entire income. Citizen B saves 90 percent of his income, which thus escapes taxation. He spends $10,000, on which he pays a tax of $250. The absolute nonconformity of this method of taxation with the ability-to-pay theory is apparent on the face of it. * * *

"The popularity of the sales tax is probably to be explained upon the ground of the sureness and the quality of the revenue it produces. The payment of the tax is so insidiously gradual that it is seldom seriously felt at any one time. The toll it takes is, however, none the less sure; and its effects upon the living standards of the people cannot be escaped. In many States, as in California, the sales tax has been the expedient used to bring relief to real and personal property. Real-estate men, as a general thing, have sponsored the sales tax in the belief that it would bring tax relief to home owners, farmers, etc. A little study will reveal that nothing could be further from the truth. * * *

"The only true relief brought to real-estate owners in California by substituting $100,000,000 in sales taxes for $76,000,000 in real and personal property taxes is to be found in the cases of large real-estate speculators whose real-estate holdings are large and whose payments in sales taxes will be relatively small. However, neither the future of the country nor the future of the real-estate business can safely depend upon the operations of such speculators."

Again, Prof. R. M. Haig, of Columbia University, recent adviser to the California Tax Commission, very forcibly expressed himself, as follows:

"Any politician who has the interest of the small home owner and rent payer at heart cannot sincerely and consistently urge the substitution of general sales taxes for real-estate taxes. So far as I am aware serious students of public finance are unanimous in the opinion that sales taxes are regressive in their tendency and effect. * * * To propose the substitution of general sales taxes for taxes on real estate as a measure of relief for the small man is an insult to the intelligence and an affront to common sense."

A sales tax is, of course, simply an additional open tax levied on top of a series of other tax items concealed in the price of any article you purchase, all of which are really sales taxes. These taxes add to the price of everything you purchase for your personal use, whether it be a house, an automobile, farm implements, store fixtures, clothing, food, or anything else. High prices prevent the people purchasing goods for their necessities or desires, slow down business, manufacturing, and the employment of labor. Manifestly, its abolition will speed up business, manufacturing, and the demand for labor will increase. That is the purpose of the constitutional amendment before the people, the text of which is printed at the end of this article.

Where, then, are we to get the money to finance our necessary Government activities? There is a way, based on the fundamental American principle of equal justice to all and special privileges to none. It will provide ample funds without wronging anybody.

RESULTS OF THE EXPENDITURE OF GOVERNMENT MONEY

Governments use the taxpayers' money, among other things, to build schools, roads, streets with sidewalks, sewers, arterial highways, and whatnot. These are essential services. But what happens? Land values instantly rise, as you soon discover if you try to buy a lot or a farm where these public improvements have taken place.

Hence, a special and privileged part of the community is benefited at the expense of the vast majority. Certainly this result is not a benefit to the dirt farmer or the would-be home builder. The persons benefited are the real-estate speculators who get something for nothing. It is proposed to start taxing these unearned increases in land values into the Public Treasury.

BENEFITS TO WORKING FARMERS

We are told that while the amendment might work well in the cities of California it will not work in the farming communities. This is untrue except in the case of a so-called farmer or speculator or the holder of great natural resources. Upon the speculator we need waste no sympathy. He has hoped to gain through the rise in land values something to which he has contributed nothing. He may even be a nonresident. The great landholders who hold blocks of territory out of development containing natural resources, in some cases of almost inestimable value, have found their taxes largely diminished with the sales tax. We would correct that situation.

The active, industrious working farmer will find that the proposed system will diminish his taxes, for it provides that buildings, farm machinery, improvements, and tangible personal assets are to be freed from taxation. He has, therefore, everything to gain.

A TAX THAT CANNOT BE SHIFTED

The landowner, whether an individual, estate, or corporation, gets all that can be had for the use of any land site. The gross rental value of the land site includes all the taxes on the land. The net rent, that which remains after all taxes have been paid, gives the land site its capitalized or selling value. People who buy or speculate in land buy or deal in the net or potential net rent that should go into the Public Treasury. The more of this flow of wealth diverted to government by taxation the less net that flows to the landowner as such. So we again emphasize that the more ground rent taken by government the less taxation that will be necessary on the goods and commodities people buy in retail stores. The less taxes in the price of goods, the greater quality and variety of goods and commodities that can be purchased. The more items of goods the more employment, since labor is required to produce each item. The more labor the more volume for all businessmen.

There is one best place to put taxes, and that place is not on land areas or merely land as such, but on the value of land. Owning land is a privilege given by the people. The value of land sites for use measures the value of the privilege. One acre in the heart of a city, or containing oil or mineral may be more valuable and produce more taxes than a thousand or more acres of ordinary farm or vineyard land. If the landowner is compelled to pay for the privilege which he holds, as proposed by this amendment and since he holds it, why should he not pay? Then the people will not have to "pay it anyway." The landowner cannot "shift" this tax.

John Stuart Mill says: "A tax on rent falls wholly on the landlord. There is no means by which he can shift the burden upon someone else * * * A tax on rent, therefore, has no effect other than the obvious one. It merely takes so much from the landlord and transfers it to the State." But it does have another effect. It enables industry to enjoy a tax reduction on the production and distribution of goods.

WHAT MAY WE EXPECT?

Since valuable, idle, or improperly used land sites will be taxed at the same rate as well-developed land sites, landowners and land speculators holding land out of use for immediate or future gain will be forced by the pressure of the tax on the privilege they are holding, and which others therefore cannot use, to use it or let others use it. They cannot continue their dog-in-the-manger attitude. With the rules of the game as they are they might as well have the unearned gain as another; but with the rules changed, no one will be able to enjoy such gains at the expense of the rest of the people.

We can look forward to the fact that unused land will be called into use whether it be in the city or in the country; that it will be possible for hundreds of thousands of men to own and develop land now held out of use and development; that with their employment, the holding of land being rendered unprofitable, markets for our manufacturers and our productions of every nature will be infinitely enlarged; that there will be a new demand for capital and labor; that our inadequately improved land in the cities will blossom out into structures useful in themselves and useful as indicating an employed and happy community; that with the exemption of houses and tangible personal property from taxation and riddance of a sales tax, even if the rate on land values should only be doubled, the small taxpayer will find his burdens lessened.

Everybody knows that where there are no people demanding the use of land, land has no value. We quote a man who made money out of land speculation; Arthur Brisbane, the well-known editorial writer, is represented by a large Middle West real-estate concern, as follows:

"Land values are made by population. When populations grow, land values grow. I had a little money laid by. I invested it in the land of growing cities, choosing my investments on the advice of men who knew values, and of whose knowledge and integrity I first satisfied myself. I profited. Then I reinvested my profits. That is all there is to it."

But what do hard-working business and professional men who help create these values think of this method of getting rich? Suppose everybody tried it? Such speculators "grow richer, as it were, in their sleep without working, risking, or economizing."

It is because high prices of land are created by the progressiveness and industry of the people that a tax on these values of sufficient proportion to divert this flow of wealth to public uses is essential. It is essential not alone to relieve the present tax emergency, but because it is one of the most potent, permanent, and deep-rooted causes of depressions and panics.

Dun & Bradstreet just last year published a book by Mr. Ray A. Foulke, manager of its analytical report department, in which this expert shows his belief that many of the evil financial conditions of the past few years "are direct results of the ever-recurring speculation in farm lands, suburban real estate, and city properties."

John Moody, publisher of the famous Moody Manuals, an eminent financial authority, says: "I know something about panics and their causes, and I do not hesitate to come out flat-footed and say that this is just the character of legislation which will tend to prevent panics, as well as to relieve congestion." He referred to a bill gradually reducing the rate of taxation on buildings and concentrating it on land values as the pending amendment does. And here we may call sharp attention to the fact that this new system, though beginning now, will not come into full effect for 5 years, thus giving business and industry ample opportunity to adjust themselves to the new order.

There is no known student of economics who defends the sales tax. On the other hand, the graduated land tax proposed in this amendment is endorsed by many eminent economists and public men.

There are many men and organizations over the United States working for this reform. In California it is being promoted by the Sales Tax Repeal Association, 83 McAllister Street, San Francisco, and the Citizens Tax Relief Association, 321 West Third Street, Los Angeles, where more comprehensive literature can be obtained.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Article XIII

SEC. 11a. Abolishing certain sales taxes. That all sales taxes in any form which have been created on behalf of the State or any subordinate jurisdiction since the 1st day of January 1933, be and the same are hereby discontinued, and the imposition of any new sales tax in whatever guise hereafter is forbidden.

Article IV

That so much of section 34a in article IV of the Constitution as reads as follows:

"Not more than 25 percent of the total appropriations from all funds of the State shall be raised by means of taxes on real and personal property according to the value thereof" be and the same is hereby rescinded and canceled; and taxation upon real and tangible personal property shall only be limited for county or city and county purposes as provided in section 2a of article XIII.

Article XIII

SEC. 2a. For the encouragement of industry. For the purpose of encouraging the establishment of homes, and for the further purpose of ultimately freeing industry in its various forms as rapidly as possible from taxation, and to encourage production by levying proper taxation upon the common product of the whole State, its land values * * * it is provided as follows:

From the assessed value of the improvements now or hereafter assessed for taxation and included in any homestead, before collection of taxation, shall be deducted the sum of $1,000.

For the first fiscal year occurring after the adoption of this section, and for each of the 4 immediately succeeding years, taxes upon tangible personal property and upon remaining improvements in and on land levied by the several counties, cities, and other taxing districts of the State, shall be decreased in the proportion of one-fifth of their assessed value, and thereafter shall cease, land-value taxation being substituted. As far as necessary, limitations of the tax rate of counties, cities, and other taxing districts shall be raised proportionately to the amount that the assessed value of tangible personal property and improvements not taxed shall bear to the entire assessed value of property subject to taxation. This provision for the gradual exemption of tangible personal property and improvements from taxation shall also be applied to any tax levied thereon for State purposes.

Improvements are defined as including all structures of any kind in and on land, and all fencing, drainage and irrigation pipes, vineyards, orchards, growing crops, and the like, increasing the value of cultivated and usable land over unused or uncultivated land.

FLOOD CONTROL—STATEMENT OF WALTER S. FENTON

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD part of a statement before the House Judiciary Committee on the flood-control bill made by Walter S. Fenton, representing the State of Vermont.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF WALTER S. FENTON, REPRESENTING THE STATE OF VERMONT, BEFORE THE HOUSE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE ON THE FLOOD-CONTROL BILL

This subject matter, particularly as it relates to interstate rivers which either run along our borders, like the Connecticut River, or whose sources are in our State, is one of very great interest to our people.

We fully appreciate the difficulties that our sister States have experienced, particularly during the last spring, because back in 1927 we went through a somewhat similar experience in a flood which was State-wide with us and which caused our little State a matter of some $30,000,000 damages. However, the problem with us is quite different from that of the States lower down the river. Their problem or their difficulty, if you please, as I look at it, is primarily because the water is not held back, but comes down to them in great quantities in times of such a flood as we had recently. We had that problem of flood damage to some extent, but nothing like they experienced. The big element in our problem of flood control on the Connecticut River is the question of retaining this water so it will not go down to their damage.

I need not spend any time in recalling to your minds that our State is a very small State. It is not wealthy. Our State is very mountainous, and its valleys are not too wide, and the more fertile, productive land, of course, is found in the valleys, as is true everywhere. So the problem of flood control is one in which, as I stated at the outset, we have a very great interest.

That is why, insofar as this resolution is concerned, that we appear before the committee speaking in favor of it, because it is primarily a problem for the States involved and affected by this stream in particular, the Connecticut River, although we do have other streams wholly within our borders that require attention. I think we have two streams that run over into the State of New York and ultimately empty into the Hudson River. But I do not think there has been any great damage from either one of them.

The studies that have been made so far on this subject, as I view it, are wholly inadequate upon which to base any efficient, effective plan of flood control. I have heard it stated this morning by some distinguished Members of Congress that we should at once build these 10 storage reservoirs that have been recommended in the Army report so that we can prevent a repetition of the same flood condition next year. While I do not know just how much investigation the gentlemen have made into the construction work of the magnitude, I would hardly expect, even if the lands were to be controlled and owned in such a way that construction work could begin tomorrow, that they could be in a condition to retain any flood waters by next spring floods.

The difficulty with that proposition as I understand it, is that the program which proposes the construction of the 10 reservoirs in question is based primarily upon studies of the 1927 flood to which I referred. The flood of 1936 which caused this great damage in Massachusetts and Connecticut was a flood of an entirely different character. To illustrate what I mean by that, this program for the construction of these reservoirs contemplates the construction of three reservoirs on the White River in Vermont. The flow of water in the White River in 1936 was only approximately one-third of the flow of water in 1927. The result was that the stream flow in the Connecticut River at White River Junction, below the discharge of the White River, was 11 second-feet per square mile less, and the drainage area above that point is approximately 4,000 square miles, which makes a stream of 44,000 second-feet lower in the Connecticut River below White River Junction in 1936 than it was in 1927.

What that means is that the water which caused the damage in the States lower down the river did not come in such substantial quantities from Vermont. On the other hand, the discharge in the New Hampshire rivers, below the so-called Ammonoosuc River was very much greater than it was in 1927. I have just been interested in looking at a graph which presents by means of engineering methods the density of the rainfall. I think they term it an isohyetal diagram, which shows that the entire rainfall in Vermont for the month of March was approximately equal to that of 1 day at Pinghams Notch in the White Mountains over in New Hampshire, where they had something like 23 inches of rainfall in the month of March, and something over 10 inches of rainfall in 2 days.

As I say, there was a greater discharge into the Connecticut River, and particularly into the Merrimac, from that source.

Why? Because that is where they have the greatest rainfall, which, coupled with the melting snow, produced this extraordinary volume of water. Having in mind the stream flow in the Connecticut River at White River Junction was 44,000 second-feet less in March of this year, at the time of the peak of the flood at Vernon Dam, which is a little north of the Massachusetts-Vermont State line, the crest of the flood was 5 feet higher than it was in 1927.

Above Vernon Dam comes in the West River, coming in from Vermont, which is quite a substantial stream. Yet the stream flow in that river was 28 second-feet per square mile less in 1936 than it was in 1927.

Above that we have the Saxtons River just below Bellows Falls, which is not a very large stream. I cannot give you the figures on it, nor on the Williams River just above it.

Above that we have the Black River. The point I want to make with you is this: That you cannot plan upon a program resulting from a study of the engineers of the 1927 flood to take care of the type of flood that we had in 1936. And it is a matter of a good deal of doubt in my mind from various information that has been given to me whether the construction of these reservoirs would have had any material effect upon the disastrous results down in Massachusetts and Connecticut. I think the sponsor of this bill made substantially the same statement this morning. In that I agree with him fully.

The thing which I have understood was the principal cause of this extraordinary and long-continued high water in the lower Connecticut resulted from the fact that there was being discharged at flood stage into the Connecticut in Massachusetts and in Connecticut waters from the tributaries located in those States which carried not only the rainfall and the quick run-off which would result from frozen ground, but it also carried with it, on account of the warming weather and the effect of the rain on the heavy snow, a substantial amount of snow water. In ordinary times, so

I am told, those flood waters from those tributaries reach their flood stage and pass on down the river a considerable time before the flood waters from the upper Connecticut reach that point. And the result is that they pass off in what we might term normal high water for spring floods. In this particular year, however, the rainfall continued for some days, and those tributaries in that section were discharging flood waters at flood crest into the Connecticut River when the flood waters came down the river. And when you have the combination of the two the rivers cannot carry it away, and this damage was done.

As I say, this problem from our standpoint is so serious that we believe it requires the most careful study and investigation, utilizing, if you please, such information as has been gotten together by the Army Engineers in their study of the 1927 flood and other floods, using all of the material that can be gotten together with respect to the 1936 flood and the conditions which caused it and contributed to it, and all other information that can be gotten together, and then have the matter in such shape that the representatives of the States involved in this particular question may sit down—as some gentlemen expressed it here this morning—across the table and see if some acceptable plan cannot be formulated that the States can agree to, that is within their economic resources to carry out, and undertake to apportion the cost of it according to the benefits; and when such a plan can be formulated, then the saving grace, if you please, is that that plan can then be submitted to the legally elected representatives of the people of each State—namely, their respective legislatures—and, in the light of all the knowledge that has been accumulated on the subject, they will then have the opportunity to weigh the advantages and the benefits, on the one hand, and the economic disadvantages, on the other hand, and determine in their own good judgment whether or not it is a plan that they can embark upon.

As I say, it is a matter peculiarly for the States themselves involved to participate in, to consider, to decide upon themselves.

There are many, many things that I might say that would have to be taken into consideration, as I view it, in such a program, but I do not care to take up the time of the committee to do that at this stage of the proceedings.

PATRIOTISM AND THE WAR AGAINST CRIME—ADDRESS BY JOHN EDGAR HOOVER

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address on the subject Patriotism and the War Against Crime, delivered by John Edgar Hoover, Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, before the Daughters of the American Revolution at Washington, on April 23, 1936.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Daughters of the American Revolution as an organization holds great significance. It is more than an institution—it is a symbol of living testimony to the traditions upon which this great Nation was founded and by which it may live and prosper. Because of this, and because an overpowering danger faces America, I feel that the subject upon which I speak should be of the utmost importance to you and all other organizations born of patriotism. I refer to the menace of crime.

It is our duty to be alert and alive to any threat against our national welfare, whether it comes from without our borders or from within. Today we attempt to live in peace with the world. We seek to command the respect of the nations among which we must live and work, and to protect ourselves against what might be called the "criminals" of the community of these nations. We try to maintain an adequate Army and Navy. We all know that such a force is an insurance for peace. But we can never make peace with the underworld. It constantly threatens an invasion of our homes, our happiness, and our civil and public rights with a concentration of armed forces greater than that of our Army and Navy combined. These are not my words, but they are those of the man to whom I owe much gratitude for his hearty support in the efforts of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Honorable Homer S. Cummings, the Attorney General of the United States. Were crime to marshal its forces in a marching body of men, they would tramp ceaselessly past this hall, hour after hour, in daylight and in darkness and back to daylight and darkness again, even though they were 10 and 20 abreast, for the files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation show that there are actually 3,000,000 convicted criminals. Beyond this there are enough more with police records to demonstrate that an average of 1 out of every 25 persons in the United States of America has at least had his brush with law-enforcement agencies and is inclined toward criminality.

This army of crime is larger than any unified force in history. If this tremendous body of evildoers could be welded into a unit of conquest, America would fall before it, not in a month, not in a day, but in a few hours. Therefore, with the seriousness of this condition truly before us, I believe it is not at all sensational to assert that while we speak of peace we are really at war; that while we believe ourselves secure we are actually besieged; that while we look with fear upon any belligerent news from foreign shores we are turning our backs upon and our thoughts from the most serious and most devastating war which this country ever has known; that of the insidious attack of the armed forces of criminality.

Not to alarm you, but for your information, there are today in America 150,000 murderers roaming at large. Statistics show that during the lifetime of those who form our population 200,000—nearly a quarter of a million—persons will commit murder before they die and more than 300,000 persons—the population of an entire metropolis—will be murdered. Consider that! Think of the scare heads which ran in the newspapers concerning the tempestuous floods which ravaged our Eastern States only a month ago. We saw the news pictures depicting scenes of suffering. We were horrified at the plight of thousands who were homeless; our hearts sank as we read the mounting list of the dead and injured. Yet if this entire condition of death, desolation, and ruin were magnified to double proportions it would not then even approach the horrible picture of miles upon miles of stiffened corpses representing the 300,000 citizens of America who today are walking the streets in the belief of security, who are making their plans, dreaming their dreams of the future, and not realizing that they are doomed to die by the foul hand of the murderer. If we are not at war with crime, then never was there such a thing as war. If this war does not demand the straining of our every tendon of patriotism in a determined campaign of eradication, then this country never has known an emergency.

And so I tell the stark truth to you women, who are known for your devotion to the country for which your forefathers gave their blood, and ask in the name of those sacrifices that you do your utmost to reinstill a spirit of determination and of self-sacrificing alertness that the loyalty to America, the fidelity to ideals, and the unfaltering courage which gave us Bunker Hill and Valley Forge may be reestablished. Let America be called to arms and arise against this marauding army of crime that we may again battle to finality, that we may fight the good fight to victory over a most despicable foe.

Above all, we must not be lured into a feeling of false security by figures emanating from time to time tending to show that crime is somewhat on the decrease. True there has been a cessation of gang kidnapings and other heinous crimes due to the highly organized activities of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, but I warn you that should vigilance relax in the slightest those outrages would be renewed in greater viciousness than ever. There can be no weeding out of noxious growths until the roots which feed these growths are torn from the filthy muck which fosters them. Throughout our country law enforcement has been hampered, hamstrung, and strangled by the blood-caked hand of crime-affiliated politics.

I know the statement I have just made sounds sensational. It smacks of headlines. But I challenge you to find out for yourselves how really true it is. Political grafters stir uneasily when honorable citizens like yourselves begin to ask questions about the close connection between violent crime and crooked politics. They do not like honest law enforcement and they do not like the truth, which is that they are the brains behind the Dillingers of this land.

This political alliance with crime exists in State after State, municipality after municipality. It halts the policeman; it halts the law-enforcement officer, even as he reaches for his gun, and holds him there, a target for the bullets of the coward he has been attempting to arrest. It stalks into our courts, brushing aside indictments, trials, and even convictions with a wave of a hand. It enters our penitentiaries, swinging wide the heavy prison gates for men who otherwise would have paid their debt to society in punishment for their crime. It condones nonfeasance in office and provides actual malfeasance. It supports bribery, perjury, and gangdom, and it has been known to place more than one ex-convict upon the force of a police department. It is firmly entrenched, deeply rooted, and can be torn from its foundations only by the concerted unswerving self-sacrificing efforts of such patriotic organizations as the Daughters of the American Revolution. Remember this always: The only thing which concerns the crooked politician is the fact that every time you catch a criminal, he loses votes. You are going to find that a great hue and cry will arise concerning the gratifying advance against crime which has been manifest within the past 2 years. You will learn that the sob sisters will soon come forth from hiding with cries of persecution against these dear, good boys whom unfeeling law-enforcement agencies insist upon sending to prison. You will discover that crackpot politicians, racketeers of a new and different type, will scuttle out from the shadows to add crime upon crime by evoking new and impossible schemes for the alleged eradication of the lawbreaker. You will see private quack fingerprint bureaus springing up here and there, willing, at the drop of the hat, to protect our citizens upon the payment of a price when those very citizens can be protected at no cost whatever by the local law-enforcement agency or the Federal Bureau of Investigation. You will be surrounded by theorists, pseudo criminologists, hypersentimentalists, criminal coddlers, convict lovers, and fiddle-faced reformers, all surging forward with great ideas for the commonwealth but mostly for their own pocketbooks.

Therefore, I warn you to stay unswerving to your task—that of standing by the men on the firing line—the practical, hard-headed, experienced, honest policemen who have shown by their efforts that they, and they alone, know the answer to the crime problem. That answer can be summed up in one sentence—adequate detection, swift apprehension, and certain, unrelenting punishment. That is what the criminal fears. That is what he understands, and nothing else, and that fear is the only thing which will force him into the ranks of the law abiding.

There is no royal road to law enforcement. If we wait upon the medical quacks, the parole panderers, and the misguided sympathizers with habitual criminals to protect our lives and property from the criminal horde, then we must also resign ourselves to increasing violence, robbery, and sudden death.

The time has come when it is the solemn duty of such organizations as the Daughters of the American Revolution to insist that there can be no compromise with crime. For too many years the citizen has viewed this problem as something with which he has no personal concern. Yet all this time he has been paying a personal tax of $120 a year for the privilege of living in a country which each year sees 12,000 murders, 46,981 cases of felonious assaults, 283,685 burglaries, 779,956 larcenies, and 247,346 automobile thefts. To use a plain Americanism, there has been too much passing of the buck; too much eagerness to hand over all criminal problems to strictly law-enforcement agencies. A policeman is only the agent of a citizen. He is only the servant of an employer—the public—and if that employer gives no attention to the business in hand, then indeed it is too much to expect that the servant will think, plan, and execute for the public that hires him. We all know that in practically every big case there is witness after witness who dodges his duty in the courtroom. We know that juries allow themselves to be swayed by personal expediency, cheap sentimentalities, politics, and sometimes by money.

It is common knowledge that in every large American city there is attorney after attorney who makes his living by counseling men whom he knows to be guilty, not only after they have been arrested, but often plans with them, plots with them, and conceives with them in the preparation of dastardly crime. We know that all about us are various figures and filaments of criminal life—the fixers, the hide-out owners, the money passers, the bond buyers, the fences, the bribers, and all the rest of the slatternly camp followers of infamy whose presence is necessary in the commission of a major infraction. All these things are of such common knowledge that children often play games in which these characters are simulated. But what does the average citizen do about it? Absolutely nothing!

It is your duty to safe and orderly society to see that a new viewpoint is brought about. To watch the criminal cases as they arise in your city; to make it your business to find out why the politically protected murderer is not captured; to guard the courtrooms against continuance after continuance and the disappearance of witnesses by which some infamous lawbreaker may be freed. Why only yesterday I was reading the statement of a criminal implicated in a notorious kidnaping. He had kept the hide-out where a man had been hidden away from his family until these notorious racketeers had been able to extort the savings of a lifetime before they freed their victim. Yet, in perfect nonchalance, he excused himself by saying that he did not know he was keeping a hide-out for a kidnaped victim. He only thought it was a witness in a murder trial whom a criminal friend desired to keep from testifying.

You as guardians of patriotism should watch appropriations and view with keen suspicion the various so-called economy moves by which venal politicians disrupt police departments, lower their morale, reduce the personnel, decrease guards at jails and prisons, bring about the possession of faulty equipment, and make their city a haven for the criminals who have promised to deliver heavy blocks of votes in return for political protection. It is your duty to see that shopkeepers, businessmen, and others who have become the victims of racketeers do their duty before the grand juries investigating these parasitical growths upon our body politic. Time after time earnest and honest prosecutors have endeavored to get at the bottom of the racketeering which is sapping steadily at the health and prosperity of this country. Time after time they have sought to solve the bombing, the murders, the assaults by which this bulk of racketeering exists, only to find that the same victims whom they are attempting to rescue constantly are stricken dumb when they appear before an inquisitorial body. In other words, these businessmen who should, as substantial citizens, be the first to display courage for the cleanliness of their city, become rank cowards before the threat of gangsterism, and I insist that there is no place in America for cowardice. I suggest also that if these men are cowards, that if they insist upon burdening their communities through their lack of fortitude, then it becomes the duty of the community to frown upon them as it would upon the racketeer who feeds upon us all. Neither I nor any member of the Federal Bureau of Investigation will knowingly have business relationships with a person whom we know to be deliberately fostering crime by refusing to aid law enforcement. If it becomes known that such patriotic organizations as the Daughters of the American Revolution place such persons beyond the pale of reputable association, then perhaps tongues will be loosened before grand juries, the shackles will be taken from the wrists of the policeman and placed where they deserve to be; the sneering vermin of gangdom will be sent scurrying into the cells where they belong, and America once more will be an unshackled Nation, free of the enforced levies of tribute by politically protected privateers.

Above all, it is your duty to inquire diligently into the record and achievements, good or bad, of every candidate who comes before you at election time. It is inconceivable that a country should be run so loosely that even ex-convicts, still maintaining their allegiance with the underworld, can be elected to office. I have said before, and I say again, that if every incumbent of public office in the United States were fingerprinted and the records of the law violators spread before the Nation in a single summary the results would amount to a scandal which would rock this country. It is not at all unusual to find in the files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation that some local patronage official who handles the public's funds and appoints the so-called guardians of public safety is discovered to possess a criminal record. The only remedy for this condition can come about through concerted efforts of organizations which are not afraid or too mentally lazy to make the life of every public official the open and clean book which this country deserves to possess in its library of public service.

Long since the time has passed when criminals hid in dark alleys or skulked in dank basements. The day of the mask and the dark lantern is over. Crime lives next door to you. Crime often plays bridge with you. Crime dances with your sons and daughters. It is ever present. But this veneer of social grace that our criminals have adopted in no way makes them less foul. They still rob and murder. They victimize America. And so for those of us who would preserve the patriotic ideals that were born in the suffering and agony of the Revolutionary days it becomes incumbent to give again of our time, of our sinews, and our strength that a most despicable enemy be repelled from our midst. These persons of the underfilth are not simply poor boys or moral invalids, as the supersentimentalists would have us believe. They are marauders, who murder for a headline; rats crawling from their hide-outs to gnaw at the vitals of our civilization. True, they are dressed as we are dressed. They live as we live, and often upon a better scale, owing to the rich rewards of their so-called profession, but their standards of life are those of pigs in a wallow, their outlook that of vultures regurgitating their filth. As such you must regard them—without sentiment, without the influence of pandering politics or of fantastic schemers, but as definite scourges to be viewed with safety only when they have been placed behind prison bars and forced to remain there until they have expiated their debts to a thoroughly outraged and sinned-against society.

During the last few years we have seen a wave of extortion flood through America. Homes have been wrecked by the threat of death, often in a manner beyond the scope of such agencies as the Federal Bureau of Investigation. In scores of instances we have seen these men arrested, watched them brought into court, and seen them freed on probation. Yet, in all these instances, I have yet to find a case where the women's clubs of a city arose in condemnation of such an outrage. I have yet to see a case where concerted effort was made to express public opinion through the pressure of the vote. I submit to you that only through this method, only through the voicing of the most urgent of protests, only through the threat of retaliation at the polls, regardless of party, can the power of the people be expressed in its attitude toward crime and its proper punishment imposed. There is too much probation and too little probationary supervision. There is too much parole and practically no follow-up system in many States by which the filthy outflow of countless prisoners is held in control. Every 2½ hours prison doors swing wide in freedom for a token of human life. A very few have served their sentences; a few more have been freed by death. The remaining thousands step forth enfolded in the sentimental mantles of parole or other forms of clemency. It is a national disgrace, in a country enriched with the traditions upon which this Nation was founded, that the average murderer serves only 4 years. There was a time in America when if a man committed a crime, he paid for that crime. In those days the total of crime was surprisingly small. With the increase of the sentimentalists we find that prison terms have gone steadily downward and that crime has climbed steadily upward—higher and still higher—and so it will continue to climb so long as public apathy allows it to do so. It was apathy which permitted the sentimentalists to make their creeping approach, to build beautiful stories about the sweet, dear convicts, who so loved freedom that they raised canary birds in cages or placed the picture of some dear old mother upon the walls of their cells.

These convict lovers built beautiful romances about this foul offspring of our national filth. They brought about the beautiful system of traveling bands for convicts, football games for convicts, tennis courts for convicts, radios in the prison blocks, and newspapers in every cell. They did all this while the citizen was busy with his own pursuits, selfishly engrossed upon what he thought was his own life. Thus today the citizen who forgot his vigilance must pay for his apathy and continue to pay for it so long as no concerted effort is made to eradicate the condition which exists.

Often we find that the most dangerous convicts are made trusties to go and come as they please. We find scandal after scandal—counterfeiting outfits discovered in prisons; sex killings such as that recently unearthed in a Midwest State; the free passage of narcotics and liquor; the selling of concessions within prison walls and buying of easy tasks; the malfeasance or nonfeasance in office necessary to wholesale escapes. All these things a citizen looks upon as appalling, and never once realizes that it is his own fault, his own problem, and his own responsibility. I place before you, therefore, the task of enlightening the thoughtless American upon the necessity for a rebirth of vigilance and the casting out of the lethargy which has brought this Nation to a maximum of 1,500,000 serious crimes per year. I do not mean misdemeanors. I mean crimes—murder, robbery, arson, aggravated assault, and aggravated thefts—until 1 out of every 16 families is annually a victim of some major violation of the law. I therefore request that you, as the leaders in patriotic America, look upon this as one of your most vital tasks—to insist upon the wider use of fingerprinting, especially of those entrusted with the public welfare; to act as sentinels upon your merchants and see that they do their duty with regard to racketeering; to pound ceaselessly at your newspapers that no infraction of apprehension or criminal procedure go unnoticed; and to act as never-ceasing monitors upon your voters in the cleansing of the dirty body of politics. Remember this: Wherever there is scandal; wherever there are faulty vice conditions; wherever there is poor enforcement of law; wherever the criminals find an open gateway to freedom through the courtroom—in such places you will find the necessity for the most urgent and most ardent of your activities.

Lest I be viewed as an alarmist, I suggest that you study it with a view to your own municipality; that you look about you in your home surroundings and the conditions as you find them. What has become of the powerful criminals who committed the most violent of infractions in your community? How long was required to convict them? What was the sentence, and what has become of them, if they were sent to prison? Are they still there, as you were led to believe by the sentence of the court, or are they again free, prowling your streets, robbing your homes, and assaulting your citizens?

In a brief way I have previously referred to the subject of parole, but not completely. Certainly there are two sides to the parole question. One is the undeniable fact that, properly administered, parole is necessary and beneficial. It is only just and proper that a first offender, through some quirk of his mentality or of fate, thrown into the clutches of the law should be given every possible opportunity to again take his place as an honest citizen. However, it is an outrage that hardened criminals should be paroled time and time again until the total in instances has amounted to as many as 5 or 10 applications of salve-like solicitude which allows these men to walk sneeringly through prison doors, again seize their instruments of depredation, and once more proceed to assault the peace and dignity of America. These include gangsters, robbers, highwaymen, professional housebreakers, ravishers of young children, patricides, matricides, and multiple murderers, who have done no more to gain freedom other than to merely ask for it. In hundreds upon hundreds of cases we find that new depredations have been committed and new sentences imposed, new imprisonments brought about, and new paroles wafted upon the shoulders of these men even while the arresting officers in the primary case still believed the subjects were in prison for their original offenses.

This is not parole! This is not humanitarian treatment of unfortunates! It is an outright perversion and defeat of our laws. It is a deliberate action of sentimentalists and others more directly and monetarily concerned in breaking down the barriers of law enforcement, in decreasing respect for law, and in making possible a constantly mounting problem for the thin line of last defense upon which depends the safety of the American people. Thousands of men are listed in the fingerprint files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation as violators of parole. Time after time these men are discovered to be under arrest in some distant State. Time after time notification is sent to the parole boards of the States which list them as violators, and time after time these parole boards have refused to return these desperate, habitual criminals for their violations. It is a well-known fact in the underworld that such States are listed as desirable ones in which to commit crime. In such places parole is a slander upon the sanctity of the home. It is absolute freedom without supervision, without pursuit, once a State line has been crossed, and without more necessity than the mere writing of an occasional letter. This is an open challenge to the people of America; a sneering grimace at respect for law; a recruiting office for constantly growing armies of criminal conquest, which would thrust aside decency, deride honesty, and disarm law enforcement.

In many areas this known attitude of clemency continues downward until it is even known to childhood violators of law. In this connection I wish to remind you that 20 percent of our crime is committed by youths of less than voting age. Of this 20 percent, it is a rare thing when a youth is found who has not, to a certain degree, considered the results of his crime before he committed it; who has not reasoned that, even though he is caught, he is still, to a degree, safe because of the mercies of probation or parole. We need some good old-fashioned American housecleaning of the kind that will rip off the dirty hangings and let in the light; that will beat out the floor coverings and sweep away the filth which has accumulated through the years of lethargy. Beyond that we need the old-fashioned influence of the old-fashioned home.

I am sick of the maunderings of fanatics and tuffetheads, who believe that the way to educate the new youth is to allow the new youth to do anything it pleases. The days of the Revolution brought forth strong men, good men, honest men. Those men were reared in homespun surroundings, upon homespun philosophies. They were reared with a reverence for the American flag and there is need today for a concerted campaign that the reverence for this flag be renewed. It will be a sad day for America when any man must apologize for patriotism. It will be an equally sad day when any person who calls himself an American must apologize to his conscience for that fact that through superindulgence, through ignorance, through mental laziness, he reared his boy or girl to be a criminal. We need new altitudes of respect, both for the parent and for law. We need a rebuilding of the foundations which made this Nation the greatest in all history, bulwarks formed of more staple materials than those of apathy, selfishness, or indulgence. America grew and prospered by unswerving loyalty to high ideals, by unfaltering respect and reverence for the law and by the kindly but unfailing vigilance of the home. Until that vigilance is restored we cannot hope for a lessening of the terrible toll of crime upon the youth of America. Until ideals are restored we still must see the young armies marching, not toward the advancement of their country, but toward the monotony of the cell block and the grayness of prison walls. Until we realize that patriotism begins at home; that vigilance is the price of safety; that law abidance is paramount in all respects; until we understand and know and follow these definite fundamentals, we must continue to face the yellow-fanged force of criminality and realize that it is our master. We must dedicate our services to America in a new war—a combat to save our lives, our homes, our children. Today's teachings become tomorrow's traditions—may you concern yourselves that they be worthy of the history and heritages upon which your organization is founded and has prospered as it should.

I would not have you conclude that this picture is painted in arresting colors by a victim of a superheated imagination. On the contrary, it is sketched against a background of stark statistics, and the dismal truths are obvious, no matter from what angle we may view the national crime problem. I wish that I might draw your attention to a portrayal in softer shades, but if I did so I would only lead your thoughts away from a condition that defies delineation in poulticed phrase.

It is a sad fact that in our present-day America more attention is given to the breeding of horse flesh upon the race tracks, to the breeding of dogs upon the hunting field, to the breeding of hogs and cows and chickens than is given to some of our humans. Our boys and our girls are the seedlings of America, to grow as their parents and their surroundings direct. The War of the American Revolution, with its agonies and its privations, was not endured for the contemporary generation, but for the happiness, the welfare, and the progress of posterity. The same conditions apply today as they applied then—we must look to tomorrow, we must clean away the filth, so that those who are young and fresh and clean may not be contaminated. We must struggle against the strangling influences which surround us, that we may not be ashamed of the heritage we leave to those who follow. To you, the Daughters of the American Revolution, I entrust this solemn duty. I feel certain I give this task into hands fully worthy of their obligation.

Thank you.

CALL FOR JUSTICE TO ADMINISTRATION'S ACCOMPLISHMENTS

Mr. LEWIS and Mr. AUSTIN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] gave the Chair notice that he would like to be recognized, and the Senator from Illinois is recognized, if he desires recognition.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] to find it convenient to remain in the Chamber for a moment or two while I submit a few remarks touching his impeachment of the record of the administration in his address last evening to the Senate.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois has asked me to remain in the Chamber, and I shall be delighted to do so; but I should like to tell him that at 20 minutes of 1 I shall be compelled to leave. I shall be here for 40 minutes, and after that time I shall have to ask to be excused.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Delaware need not concern himself greatly as to any time after the limit he has put upon himself. I recognize his need for self-preservation.

Mr. President, yesterday the very able representative of that which we speak of as the Republican Party, the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], addressed the Senate seeking to point out, and in his phraseology, with much fury, impeached what he felt were the deficiencies of administration and in the particulars he designated. Particularly, the able Senator seemed to fall into a line of what seems a purpose of attack from those who have arranged their program of assault in the coming controversy that is just ahead, designated as a political campaign.

For myself, having great respect for the capacity of the distinguished Senator and those who join him from time to time in their exclamations and denunciations adverse to the policies of the administration, I cannot but deplore that there seems speciously the voice of condemnation as to anything and everything undertaken by this Government; that at no time there seems to be from these political opponents any voice of approval of any act, of any relief, of any benefaction, of any generosity, nor of any achievement on the part of this their own country, the United States of America, when accomplished through this administration.

The able Senator from Delaware was voicing evidently the very first of the program which we observe from those who are attending here in delegations called commercial organizations. The purpose of the assault is to prepare the ground to charge that that which is called platform has in some respects or in many respects in no wise contained any authority or warrant for conduct and put in effect and for action achieved of the administration.

Here in this responsible place I propound to the American public, in answer to the able Senator and those who shall follow his course the query, in what manner could a convention in June 1932 have seen ahead of it the conditions which had been brought upon the Republic by the administration then in power for the months of its life to follow? Who could have anticipated that when that administration was defeated it would have allowed the months after defeat, in a spirit of revenge and resentment, to lapse into a period when its representatives busied themselves to turn the fury of their opposition upon their own country, and brought the Nation to the point where its children walked the streets in hunger, their fathers struggled to exist in crushing want, their homes were blighted with desolation, and the whole great Nation of America stood before the world with her arms outstretched in beggary?

Who could have anticipated the condition that would follow on the part of the masters then in power by which the banks of the land were allowed to ravage themselves, their officers to loot their deposits and rape their own credits. Then to stand before the Nation with billions of dollars robbed of the people, from which there was not a recourse or resource anywhere that could restore a dollar?

Who could have foreseen that there would have been that array of men and women who, in desperation from oppression put on them, from point to point throughout the Republic, committed suicide, some throwing themselves from the elevations of great buildings, others destroying their lives by leaping from windows at the top stories of great edifices, and there finding refuge in any place rather than bear the ordeal and endure the affliction of what the administration was then putting upon them. All this, sir, was particularly following the conventions when the political and financial miscreants began to reveal their dishonorable purposes, and after it became impossible for any convention or otherwise to have discerned their object and declared provisions to oppose or remedy the conspiracy.

I ask the able Senator, conscious of his capacity as a great lawyer as well as an able advocate of his great party, how stand the opposition? Let us behold for a moment this question of the business of the platform as the only authority for conduct and the justification for action.

Will not the able Senator recall that there was the administration of Mr. Hoover? Where, in the platform of the party called Republican was there the authority or the designation to create something in the form of an organization called a Farm Loan Board, the like of which had no parallel in the law, yet to convert $500,000,000 of the money of the American people to waste and to dissipation? Yet let us believe that the distinguished President of that date felt possibly what he was doing was best from his lights, though there were no platform authority or platform declaration.

Then, sir, who will recall that there was anything in the platform that announced to the American poor and miserable, the uninformed, and the uneducated of government, the ignorant, and the unhappy in life's station, that under the name of the "noble experiment", called prohibition, thousands—16,000 human beings of America—in one form or another were to be seized, jailed for having brewed some mere sustenance in the form of liquid for themselves, their property under the name of an equity proceeding confiscated, everything they possessed taken, leaving them to bankruptcy and poverty, while their children were disgraced forever, as their fathers languished in prison, in jail, in the penitentiary? And in the meantime you prate of the Constitution and court obedience to the fundamental law as your personal trust to be guarded!

Shall you omit to recall that under the guise of prohibition and what you call legal constitutional rights, the Supreme Court of the United States found it agreeable to sustain action on the part of officials in hooking into a telephone line and seizing the private messages of one person to another, and under the guise of necessity for law and the enforcement of prohibition did that unprecedented thing which, we pray God, shall never happen again to America, when under the Constitution it was justified that a man's private conversations over the telephone to another could be caught over an intruding wire by prying spies and, when ascertained, could be testified on oath as legitimate hearsay testimony, and upon this the man involved sent to jail, his family ruined, his property destroyed, and he himself and his family forever disgraced under the Constitution?

Was this, may I say to my able friend, contemplated in the platform of my honorable opponent? Was there a word to be found in it that told the American public that this form of obloquy was to be visited upon them, this disgrace to the Nation, this dishonor upon these helpless mortals to be inflicted upon Americans?

May we not pause a moment while we ask the able advocate where in the platform of our honorable opponents was there any authority given to the President of the United States by intimation, much less by declaration, to grant a moratorium to the foreign debtor nations authorizing them to cheat this American Nation out of $10,000,000,000 principal, the interest due not yet paid even in part?

Where was there any statement in the platform which justified that usurpation? Where under the Constitution, for which such solicitude is being expressed, was there authority on the part of this honorable official to take the credit from this Nation, grant it to foreigners, and leave us helpless and in bankruptcy of that great sum now due to this country?

I ask again, therefore, may it not be that the honorable President felt that what was being done was best under the circumstances? But, however so, I appeal again, where was the platform privilege to do such? Yet when this, our administration, found these new conditions arising which multiplied upon them when no way to anticipate them existed, and sought to provide against those conditions, they are held as offenders against some sacred compact which one would imagine has been arranged between heaven and earth, and which we are charged with having violated with dishonor.

May I ask my worthy friend, and those who shall follow his leadership in a very unworthy cause, who authorized the President of the United States, Mr. Hoover, or his forces, to create this body of finance which my able friend in his ferocious argument yesterday claimed credit for with great acclamation, and which was called the R. F. C.? Who authorized them, and in what platform can we find where the privilege was declared, to organize themselves and do that which the able Senator from Delaware now confesses, as was confessed in his presence by the then Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. Reed, took billions of American money, snatching it out of the pockets of the poor who must pay out of their wages the interest upon this money through their employers, and turning it over to the large interests, which interests are today, with this money in their pockets and in their Treasury, having their agents and representative here in the city of Washington, in the name of one form or another of society and association, condemning the President of the United States and the Government of the United States for doing the very thing they solicited as necessary to their welfare; and this, too, while they are carrying in their Treasury and in their pockets the money the loan of which they are denouncing?

Yet we are told, sir, of the high principle of honor, which, it is said, is that which is only inducing and justifying and stimulating action on the part of those who busily condemn every movement looking to the benefit of the needy and welfare of the deserving of America.

Mr. President, my able friend says, "Yes; but we must pause and remember that there was an effort on the part of the administration in 1932 which looked fairly well upon the prospect of recovery; or at least it should be given credit", says my able friend, "for the effort in some direction, and for that it should not be forgotten." I answer my friend, I accept exactly this praise in the form of apology in behalf of those we call the Republican Party of that day; and I remind him, as to himself and the eminent sources that will follow him, that their position is best described by an epitaph which may be found on a tombstone in a graveyard not far from where we sit. I think, if I recall correctly, it reads:

Me head is thick, me legs are thin;
But I'm a damned fine man for the shape I'm in.

[Laughter.]

Mr. President, if we recall the able indictment of the eminent former President, leader of this former great party, let us ask what has become of the money which fled from these debased and gutted banks? What has become of those millions and millions of dollars? Where is, and where are, those funds? And let us ask the able Senator, who probably is more advised than many men in public life on the side of his honorable party, who is it that Mr. Hoover says in his last speech on the radio took the money of America, and, using the words of the ex-President, "took flight"? Who were those who sent the funds of their own land to a foreign country where they could be hidden from the tax gatherer on the one hand, and denied to the resources of America in its day of agonizing adversity? Since the indictment is made, and the impeachment from the eminent leader of the party then in power, may we not pause here a moment to ask so learned a statesman as the eminent Senator from Delaware what are the names of these malefactors who I say should be arraigned in civilization as traitors to their country, these who took the money of this Republic out of the land, and either invested it in foreign countries in the bonds and securities of enemy lands on the one hand, or securely ensconced it in safe-deposit boxes, far from the American-tax gatherer or the defense or protection of their American Nation?

My able friend says, referring to some speeches that have been made on the floor of the Senate by the majority leader, and that of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], alluding to stocks and bonds: "Yes; behold them", says the Senator. "True, they have risen." But for that my able friend will not credit the administration, nor will he concede that the rise in value is stable, secure, or real. Then, sir, I put the question to you: What is the meaning on the part of these prominent financiers, whose names and whose companies were read by my honorable friend, in putting stocks before the country and selling them again upon representations that they confess are thimble-rigging the market and swindling everyone who dares to trust them? For if these stocks be as the honorable leader the Senator from Delaware says, then they are an imposition upon the public, and those who are advancing and sustaining them should be under indictment for public national fraud, fraud and robbery of the widow who trusted to the advertisement, upon the child whose estate is being sacrificed, and upon the businessman whose confidence is beguiled and betrayed. If, on the other hand, these stocks are real, as let us believe they are, and their rising is the evidence of prosperity, from whence comes it if not come through the efforts, the services, the contributions both of wisdom and patriotism on the part of the administration in power? And who is it who purchases these securities, I ask my able friend, if it be not those who have confidence in this their Government, in the methods of this administration, in the measures of the President and his supporters? Otherwise, where would there have been a purchaser from any other source? Because those who are now manipulating these stocks are the same master manipulators who, a few years past, in some form and in some manner seizing the Government's money, speculated in stocks to the amount of billions of money, and sold to the people that which, like a bubble, burst in the air and left them empty and bankrupt. Shall these same manipulators be permitted now to receive praise and endorsement because we have sustained them by some new policy that has reinstated them into opportunity?

Yet my able friend the eminent Senator from Delaware would have us believe that this is all caused by some accident! I fear our able friend overlooks the fact which was published that here in the city of Washington, on the outskirts, there was seen a tent. A couple of men, wandering through, concluded it was a circus and thought they would find their way into it, after the order of the small boy, by slipping under the sides of the tent for free amusement. They entered in glee only to awake to the fact that instead of a circus of entertainment it was a religious revival service into which they had fallen! These eminent masters of stocks and exchange, while in the beginning certainly in the circus of their past performance, have waked to realize the benefits and cash in on the revival, sir, of confidence and honor established by this administration through the measures it has put before the Nation and had adopted.

Therefore, I ask my able friend, why should these people around him scorn the relief that we were compelled to give to the hungry, to those who walked the streets in desolation, who under their march and tread threatened revolution—a duplication of Russia and of Germany? Why are these scoffed and scorned because of the relief they are compelled to take? I propound to the eminent leader this question: Who put these people upon the necessity of that relief? Who placed them in the position where they had to put their pride under their feet and, like beggars upon the street, solicit alms for the preservation of their children and the maintenance of their habitations? Now that some relief is given, large and small, shall the great be found going hither and thither scorning the sources from whence these blessings came? What shall we say? Sir, we are pleased to reecho the expression of King Lear, as he beheld a similar situation of his time, crying forth, as Shakespeare records:

Poor naked wretches, whereso'er you are,
That bide the pelting of this pitiless storm,
How shall your houseless heads and unfed sides,
Your loop'd and window'd raggedness, defend you
From seasons such as these? Oh, I have ta'en
Too little care of this! Take physic, pomp;
Expose thyself to feel what wretches feel,
That thou mayst shake the superflux to them,
And show the heavens more just.

What has become of the spirit of this great body? What has become of the hearts of the eminent men on both sides who fill these places with distinction? Why in all America is there not yet one voice of approval rising from our honorable opponents? What is the quality of justice which finds in the whole service of the administration to the people nothing they could praise, nothing to which they could give their endorsement, nothing to which they could give their commendation?

Billions of money, it is said, have been expended. Has anyone asserted that one dollar has found its way corruptly into the hands of those who have expended such vast and unparalleled sums, as the honorable, able advocate correctly describes them? Not at all. Has anyone risen here to assert, whatever abuses there may have been, as has been from time to time clearly shown on the part of those who are trusted with the administration in local places, that a dollar has ever gone wrong in any form of dishonor on the part of those who have as officials administered this great trust? Is there no voice of approval for such faithful servants? Is there no praise for America when you behold her elevation and superiorities? Yet one hears the eminent leader speak of the American dollar, and refer to it as having been brought down to a 59-cent dollar!

What does all that mean? What is the meaning of telling the poor who toil with their hands that the dollar they have will buy them only 50 cents' worth of goods and has the value of only 59 cents? What is the meaning of advertising to the world that falsehood and slander upon American credit? Where is the cry of inflation of which we heard so much only a short while ago? Where is it? The eminent leader here to my right of the great cause of expansion of money, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] insists that the dollar is yet far from its real level, and that today one purchases with the dollar $1.25 or $1.30 of value; and yet what does it mean, Senators—I propound this not in partisanship but as I address the sense of your patriotism—that there could really arise in this great body a band of honorable men, sensible and loyal, let us believe, who find it agreeable to advertise to the world that in this body there is no credit accorded to America, and that we regard its money as so dishonorable that there is none so poor as to do it reverence? Is this patriotism? Is this the honor of the ancient Republican Party, with its distinguished past?

Behold, how stand you compared to the world? This morning announces the marching hordes of revolt and riot in France, its heretofore professed gold standard dwindling, its credit rapidly evaporating. With Poland on day before yesterday—a country of splendid industry—adopting the financial doctrine of America, emulating our system of money and distribution, while great Sweden, in her calmness and sure conservatism, adopts the policy of the United States, and the Scandinavian countries one after the other copy her, now in this hour comes the news that Holland and Belgium are discussing a method by which this America arranges what is called the managed currency, this to emulate, copy, and proceed with our policy and financial system. Sirs, is there nothing to be said anywhere in behalf of America? Eminent Americans, I propound to you, is there nothing anywhere in your country that you can find to endorse? Everywhere, at all times, through the public press and otherwise, are we to see nothing but condemnation from you, first upon your administration, then upon your country, holding your Nation as unworthy, as you deplore your citizens' existence under a Democratic administration?

I shall not dwell further upon my honorable friend but to ask him, when he speaks of the security of this money, if he will not admit that these vast sums of money which have gone for relief have not gone into the pockets of the poor and the miserable who were needing it? They have expended it, and then by them it has been passed into the hands of these eminent financial and commercial masters, who used it for stock speculation, as they enriched themselves upon the money through the indirect method of taking it from those who are compelled to buy bread, clothing, and shelter. But hear we one word of confession? Yet it is recalled that these eminent masters, who are around this Capital community now in different forms of association, once not long since came here on their knees, as it were, in subservience, confessing the need of relief to save them from bankruptcy, receivership, and destruction; and with the American money in their banks lifting open their doors in order to give confidence again to the depositors and to their country, they now stand before the assemblages denouncing the very measure that gave them the relief and the Government which loaned them the money.

I would not engage here in an appropriate expression; but those around me recall the homely adage that "it is a dirty bird that befouls its own nest." While these here around us are holding these meetings, being greatly advertised and asserted and in every wise promulgated in their denunciations of the administration and their own country, I summon my eminent friend to cite from the eminent leaders of the opposition here in this Chamber, or these gentlemen who have assembled here to add their condemnation in the Capital—to be used for political purposes—one single word approving the administration, or the sacrifices which rescued the farmer from complete destruction when the administration came to his rescue in the days of drought?

Where is one word; aye, where is a single resolution that has ever been passed by one of these assemblages expressing sympathy for the misery of the city toilers or offering any aid in behalf of their unfortunate plight?

As we all know, we but lately had the floods which inundated the country, wiped out homes, destroyed hundreds and hundreds of human lives, robbed them of their all, of home and shelter, leaving them helpless; yet where is one word of commendation of the administration and its officials for the noble work they did in coming to the rescue of their country and those in this sad plight I have described?

Where is one resolution of sympathy or expression of aid on the part of these eminent gentlemen who assemble here to find a method of condemnation in some form of the administration to which they owe their very commercial life? Are they too cowardly, or are they too lacking in the impulses of gentility, to grant justice to the administrators of such great trusts?

Sirs, we are not deceived. We recall that the great Holy Law contains the wonderful expression of consolation, crying out:

> Be not deceived; God is not mocked. For whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap.

I now summon my friend to the thought and ask him if he does not feel that the time has come when there should be something of an abandonment of partisan politics, and something of a resumption of national patriotism? Has not the hour come when someone on the side of our honorable opponents can find the good, and fulfill the adage, as well as the admonition, of the great St. Paul, commanding?—

> Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.

I conclude by asking, has not the time come when you shall certify that your President has proven himself worthy of trust? Where else shall you go? To whom else shall you plead, or to whom shall those who represent you or those for whom you speak plead, if it shall not be in the power and the character of the administration guided by the President of the United States?

Behold, when nations all around the world are in revolution, when everything is desolate, everything discouraged, everything abandoned, America alone stands firm, respected in the world, honored by civilization as the first nation of all earth. Yet is there no praise for that which has produced this commendable condition?

I submit to my honorable opponents, particularly the genial leader from Delaware, whether the time has not come when we shall acclaim to the world that, without regard to differences in small matters, we turn to America and announce on her behalf that we recognize that the world beholds and applauds that here it is that the great republican democracy of the earth finds its example and life of exalted service. Here and now we grant praise in all justice to the President of the United States, Franklin Roosevelt, and his administration of persevering patriots.

I thank the Senate for allowing me this moment's indulgence.

THE FARMERS AND THE NEW DEAL

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, I know that we have all enjoyed very much listening to the very eloquent address of the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. I merely wish to take 2 or 3 minutes of the time of the Senate to invite the attention of the Members of this body to a pamphlet which has come to me as having been distributed quite widely at our State university in Wisconsin. It is entitled "A Farmer Speaks", and from what I see on the back page it appears to be circulated by the American Liberty League, national headquarters, National Press Building, Washington, D. C. It is designated as "Leaflet No. 5." It purports to be a letter written by one Elmer Willis Serl, who gives his address as Lone Oak Farm, Route 1, Delavan, Wis., and he starts out by saying:

> Three cheers for the Supreme Court. Now maybe I can run my farm without interference from political parasites of the tax body who tell me what I may raise on my land, how much of it, or none at all.

He then goes on to state that for 25 years he has paid taxes on his 200-acre farm in Wisconsin and attempted to make the farm pay. He distinguishes himself as a plain farmer who has been to Washington only 25 times and ends up with a fervent appeal to the farmers of America and, I assume, the farmers in Wisconsin in particular, to do their duty next November and to throw out the New Deal lock, stock, and barrel.

I have never heard of Mr. Seri as one of the farm leaders in my State, and had in mind that I would write to Wisconsin to find out something about him. I fully intended to do so, but before I had an opportunity to write I received a letter from a man who lives in the immediate vicinity of Delavan, a very good friend of mine, one in whom I have the utmost confidence, and he gives me a little information about this distinguished gentleman.

I do not know why this pamphlet appears in yellow. Perhaps it is symbolic of the golden grain at harvest time, or it may be that it is yellow journalism. But at least the gentleman who is supposed to be the author apparently has not had a great deal of experience as a farmer. I am informed by this friend of mine that for 25 years this gentleman, who spends most of his time as a preacher in North Carolina, has had a farm which his father left him. It is situated 1 mile north of Delavan. He "has not had a horse or cow or pig or sheep in the barn in 25 years. A real-estate dealer in Delavan named Robar helps him rent the land out in small lots to adjacent farmers. He has also acquired a small set of buildings and some land across the road. He rents that house and land but there is not, and has not been for some years, any livestock of any description, except rats, in that barn."

My informant goes on to say that this distinguished farmer quoted by the American Liberty League "has not, so his neighbors say, milked a cow, held a plow, raised a crop himself, or fed a pig—except with a knife and fork—for the last 25 years. His barns are antiquated, plank floors, and so forth, and no condenser would take a pound of milk produced in them at any price."

I merely desired to reassure Senators that when they go to bed tonight they should not lose any sleep thinking about the terrible things the New Deal has done to the farmers of the country, and this farmer in particular, because he is probably now down in North Carolina playing golf. [Laughter.]

ALTERNATIVES FOR NEW DEAL POLICIES

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, we have been wondering what would constitute the Republican plan for handling the various problems of the depression in the event of their hopes for next November being realized. It is not that I or anybody else that I know of on either side of the political frontier line anticipates any such thing, but it is, nevertheless, of interest to know what it is proposed to put in place of the New Deal policies which have been so bitterly assailed and criticized from the Republican side of this Chamber.

Perhaps there is a partial answer to the question in an article in Thursday's Philadelphia Record, which I am going to ask be put in the RECORD. This article purports to give a summary of the philosophy of Prof. Thomas Nixon Carver, professor emeritus of Harvard University and one of the leaders of the new Republican "brain trust." It must be admitted that Professor Carver is definite and specific in his remedies. He thinks the unemployment problem should be met by drastic curtailment of relief, sterilization of those he describes as palpably unfit, birth control to keep the population down, and limitation of marriage to those rich enough to afford to buy and maintain an automobile.

It has been the habit of our political adversaries to charge the President with responsibility for anything and everything that the technical advisers in the Government service write or say. On the same principle, it might perhaps be excusable to attribute Professor Carver's ideas of eliminating unemployment problems to Governor Landon, assuming that he is going to be the nominee, and perhaps to Chairman Fletcher, of the Republican National Committee, as an ad-interim sponsor of population restrictions.

Or perhaps the whole thing might be attributed to the Du Pont Liberty League, for, according to the article, one of the measures advocated is the organization of the property class in a party to put over this program. So I now offer Mr. Robert S. Allen's review of the professor's book and ask unanimous consent that it be included in the RECORD.

G. O. P. "BRAIN TRUSTER'S" FASCIST PLAN WOULD LIMIT MARRIAGE AND RELIEF—END OF REGULATION OVER BUSINESS AMONG PROPOSALS OF HARVARD PROFESSOR IN ECONOMICS—STERILIZATION OF UNFIT, BIRTH CONTROL, AND IMMIGRATION BAN URGED TO END LABOR OVERSUPPLY

By Robert S. Allen

WASHINGTON, April 29.—A program of pronounced fascist character is being advocated by a leading member of the recently organized Republican "brain trust."

He is Thomas Nixon Carver, professor emeritus of political economy at Harvard University, and his extraordinary policies are contained in an 84-page booklet entitled "What Must We Do to Save Our Economic System?" It has been privately circulated among business leaders.

WOULD CURTAIL RELIEF

Lauding theories advocated by Hitler and Mussolini, the Republican "brain truster" proposes that the following program be adopted by the "substantial people of America, the real forgotten men", to combat New Deal measures and policies:

1. Relaxation or elimination of Government regulation and restraints on business.
2. Drastic curtailment of unemployment relief, with the jobless needy "forced off (relief rolls) by severe regulations" if necessary.
3. Sterilization of the "palpably unfit", use of birth control, limitation of marriage to those who can afford to buy and maintain an automobile, and exclusion of all immigrants in order to reduce the oversupply of labor.
4. Organization of the properties class in a party to put over this program.

Carver's name is the only one on the cover of the pamphlet, but on an inside page are the names of three sponsors: Harold L. Doolittle, chief consulting engineer of the Southern California Edison Co.; Franklin L. Pratt, an insurance-company official; and Ernest Carroll Moore, vice president of the University of California, at Los Angeles.

In a foreword by these sponsors they reveal that Carver formulated his platform in collaboration with a large group of California bankers, utility officials, and business executives.

It is reliably understood that the pamphlet has been widely circulated as a confidential document among business men hostile to the administration.

BLAMES LABOR OVERSUPPLY

In his pamphlet Carver holds that the chief economic problem facing the country is unemployment. This is due, he contends, to an oversupply of labor. To remedy this he proposed what he calls "the alternative to unemployment relief", viz, birth control, sterilization, restricted marriage, elimination of immigration.

Pending the operation of these measures, he proposes in the meantime to give business its head by curbing or eliminating Government regulation, balancing the Budget, and stopping "tinkering with our monetary system."

He also advocates cutting taxes, but would continue public works of a permanently useful nature. None of the Government's projects, however, would be of a kind to compete with private industry. Publicly owned power plants would be taboo.

Carver lays great stress on his fear of a Communist revolution. "The trouble has always been that economic planners have wanted to control the symptoms rather than the causes of the disease that afflicts the body politic", Carver writes. "In all this welter of discussion of economic planning, scarcely a word has been uttered on the important subject of population planning.

"Yet the population problem is fundamental, and the most dangerous form of laissez faire is that which leaves the quantity and quality of our population to blind forces which are cruder and more dangerous than so-called blind economic forces.

"So long as people who lack intelligence continue to spawn others who lack intelligence we shall have more of such people than we can possibly employ at good wages."

Carver voices a low opinion of the present reproductive processes, which, he says, are initiated by "the emotions, the passions, and the ignorance of men."

He explains that in the past strong races have taken care of their population by imperialistic territorial expansion.

"Strong races have, in the past", he declares, "solved the problem of maintaining a favorable man-land ratio by taking more land when they needed it. They at least had far-reaching plans for the solution of the fundamental problem of the man-land ratio.

"In this respect they were, on the intellectual, if not on the moral side, far ahead of any of our present-day economic planners outside of Italy, Germany, and Japan."

DUCE AND HITLER NOT SO BAD

While insisting that he abhors any governmental scheme which interferes with the freedom of the individual, Carver intimates that Mussolini and Hitler may not be as bad as painted. After all, he says, are they not the foes of communism?

He predicts that "hungry hordes from Russia, gazing covetously across their borders at countries blessed with capitalistic plenty, will some day invade Europe."

"Europe will once more stand with her back to the Atlantic, fighting for its existence against the hordes from the east", he says. "Possibly Mussolini and Hitler are more far-seeing than the rest of us and are prepared to stand together at another field of Chalons as the ancestors of their people did in A. D. 451, who knows?"

Carver expands on his encomiums to Hitler by contending that the Nazi Fuehrer did the "rational" thing of segregating and sterilizing congenital defectives.

The United States could solve its unemployment problem, Carver says, by also engaging in a policy of imperialistic territorial expansion. He admits sadly, however, that Americans as a whole seem "especially unfitted, both by geographical position and temperament, for a career of expansion by conquest and colonization."

FINDS MENACE IN MASSES

He warns, however, that "propertyless masses" may have no "moral scruples" against such adventures.

"The landless and propertyless masses of Europe and America may find it easier to take land from their richer fellow citizens than to take land from weak races in distant parts of the earth", Carver says, adding that this is a suggestion which "property owners would do well to ponder."

The "brain truster" does not spare the goose flesh of his businessmen sponsors in any portion of his pamphlet: Speaking of the possibilities of violent revolution, he says:

"The law of proletarian revolution is startling in its arithmetical simplicity. Where manual workers become overwhelmingly numerous they will have both the motive for revolution and the power to carry it through to success."

Carver ends his booklet with a call to action. He pleads with the "substantial people" to organize and defend their rights.

He suggests that it might be possible to "persuade the perplexed masses that they have more to hope for under our system than under any other."

PROHIBITION OF PRICE DISCRIMINATIONS

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (S. 3154) making it unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to discriminate in price or terms of sale between purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality, to prohibit the payment of brokerage or commission under certain conditions, to suppress pseudo-advertising allowances, to provide a presumptive measure of damages in certain cases, and to protect the independent merchant, the public whom he serves, and the manufacturer from whom he buys, from exploitation by unfair competitors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I regret that I am unable to support the amendment or agree to its incorporation in the bill. The amendment, as I interpret it, seeks to exempt, among others, automobile manufacturers from those provisions in the bill which relate to price differentials.

If the amendment should be agreed to, any manufacturer of automobiles who buys parts which have been manufactured by others in large quantities would find no limitation or restriction whatever on his purchasing power in its relation to competition with other manufacturers of automobiles.

There is in the bill what is known as the classification proviso, which, it seems to me, fairly takes into consideration the interest involved in the proposed amendment. That language appears on page 5, line 17, where it is proposed that the pending amendment shall be incorporated. I quote from the bill:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent differentials in prices as between purchasers depending solely upon whether they purchase for resale to wholesalers, to retailers, or to consumers, or for use in further manufacture; nor differentials which make only due allowance for differences in the cost, other than brokerage, of manufacture, sale, or delivery resulting from the differing methods or quantities in which such commodities are to such purchasers sold or delivered.

That would give equal treatment to all manufacturers, recognize their rights within limitations to secure quantity differentials, and, in my judgment, is a fair provision, which would be counteracted in part by the incorporation of the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, which in effect excepts from the operation of the bill manufacturers of automobiles who buy, in large quantities, parts already manufactured by others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan to the committee amendment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, of course the amendment is not a class amendment applying only to automobile manufacturers. It deals in general language with industrial production.

In the first place, I have never understood that this bill was primarily concerned about rearranging the rules of industrial production in the United States. I assumed that it was primarily a bill related to retail merchandising and the establishment and maintenance of fair practices. As a basic consideration, I can see no reason why, in the pursuit of the latter objective, we should reach into industrial production and apply to it rules which are primarily contemplated for retail merchandising in other fields.

It certainly is a very serious thing to propose, however indirectly, to interrupt the ordinary industrial production process in this country without ever having given industry a chance to appear before the committee and to thresh out the problem as industry believes it may be affected.

The Senator from Arkansas says he thinks industry is protected by the language he has read. If he is correct about it, I submit that the pending amendment is merely a confirmation of his interpretation of what the bill proposes to do; and I further submit that if there is any reason why the confirmation should be refused, we are invited to the conclusion that perhaps the interpretation that has been given us may not be wholly correct and reliable.

What is the thing that the amendment is seeking to do? Solely and only to assure the privilege of legitimate differentials in price, as between equivalent purchasers, by reason of difference in quantity of purchase and sale in industrial production. We have been repeatedly told that it is not the purpose of the bill to prevent differentials in price so long as the differentials are equally applied to all equivalent purchasers. There is not anything in my amendment which offends against that principle. It is simply a reassertion of the right to maintain price differentials on a quantity basis to equivalent buyers. There is nothing in the amendment which offends against the principle of equality nor which offends against the purpose to prevent unjust and undue discrimination.

The Senator from Arkansas has indicated that he thinks the amendment particularly applies to the automobile business. I am in no position to speak authentically for that business in this aspect. It is a fact, however, as everyone, I assume, generally knows, that the mass-production method in automotive production does rely for one of its factors upon quantity price advantages in purchases, in order ultimately to produce a maximum value at a minimum cost for the benefit of the buying public. I have never heard anyone suggest that there is anything immoral about it or contrary to public policy. On the contrary, it seems to me that we are constantly being pointed to the service now being rendered by the automotive industry in this country in respect to its contribution to recovery—a contribution which, by the way, is diametrically opposite to the economic theory which the President promulgated in New York last week, because it is a process based upon the lowest possible price plus the highest possible wage, plus the greatest possible sale attracted through this high value at low cost.

I am sure that the Senate does not wish to interrupt these processes as a result of this bill, which is intended to deal with something else; and all in the world I am asking is that my amendment, confirming what the Senator from Arkansas says is the intention of the bill, shall be permitted to go to conference for the first study anyone will ever have had a chance to give to this phase of the legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 6 of the committee amendment, line 14, after the word "trade", it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent price changes from time to time where in response to changing conditions affecting the market for or the marketability of the goods concerned, such as but not limited to actual or imminent deterioration of perishable goods, obsolescence of seasonal goods, distress sales under court process, or sales in good faith in discontinuance of business in the goods concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont to the committee amendment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the purpose of my amendment is very simple. It is to take care of recognized changes in market conditions, as well as to take care of seasonal and perishable goods.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this is a general amendment and, I think, a very valuable one. It does make provision in general language for a number of conditions which might arise, and to meet which amendments excepting certain commodities from the provisions of the bill have been proposed. I prefer this general language, and I am sure the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], who is familiar with the subject, also does.

I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Arkansas if this is substantially the same amendment as that proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH]?

Mr. ROBINSON. The pending amendment is entirely consistent with but in some respects different from the amendment of the Senator from Washington. The amendment of the Senator from Washington does not contain all the provisions which are embraced in the pending amendment. I will say in this connection that the Senator from Washington presented his amendment yesterday afternoon. Not having had the opportunity of studying it, I asked that it go over until today. There is no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Washington, and it is not inconsistent with the pending amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont is in proper form and will be helpful to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, yesterday the National Cooperative Milk Producers' Association sent a letter to a number of Senators. I was the recipient of one of those letters which refer to one or two proposed amendments to the pending bill. In a hasty conference with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] yesterday, and later in the afternoon with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I agreed to offer the amendment this morning for their consideration and the consideration of the other Members of the Senate. At this time I should like to have the clerk read the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon offers an amendment to the amendment of the committee, which the clerk will state.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the amendment of the committee at the end of section 2 (a) it is proposed to strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following proviso:

And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price in the same or different communities made in good faith to meet competition.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is very obvious and readily observed that this is a restoration of the language of the Clayton Act so far as it is possible to make it applicable in the matter of competition in a given line. The Senator from Arkansas suggested that it might be included in the phraseology of the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], but, in my opinion, the amendment of the Senator from Vermont does not include the proposal I have just submitted and which has been read by the clerk.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] this morning thought the same idea was carried in the so-called Borah-Van Nuys amendment. Of course, if that is the situation, I do not desire to press the amendment; I am willing to trust the judgment of the Senator who has the bill in charge and, if that is his view, there are either of two courses he could take. One would be to accept the amendment or state specifically that, in his best judgment, it is already a part of the amendment that has been incorporated in the pending bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I cannot say that I think the amendment which the Senator from Oregon has proposed is identical in effect with the amendment of the Senator from Vermont which the Senate has just agreed to; but I do say that I think the purpose which the Senator has in mind is accomplished by the amendment that has been agreed to.

I myself would not be able to accept at this juncture language that is so general as that contained in the pending amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon. I should prefer that the Senator withhold the amendment until opportunity can first be afforded for its further consideration, if the Senator has no objection to that course.

Mr. McNARY. I always desire to be accommodating, and shall be so in this instance; but I ask at this point, Mr. President, to have read a letter from a large creamery association operating in the State of Oregon which sells the products of milk throughout the country, and which explains the reason and justification for the proposal which I have just made. I ask that the clerk read the letter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TILLAMOOK COUNTY CREAMERY ASSOCIATION,
Tillamook, Oreg., April 27, 1936.

Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have a letter from the National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation, Washington, D. C., regarding what is known as the Robinson-Patman bill. This bill attempts to fix a resale price of a product in various markets without taking into consideration what it might cost to carry stock in the various markets.

For instance, we store a large part of our cheese in Portland, feeling that we are an Oregon organization and, everything else being equal, should favor our own State. We also carry large quantities of cheese in storage in Oakland, San Francisco, Los Angeles, and San Diego. The freight to the various points is an item that must be taken into consideration in fixing a resale price. The storage costs are also a large factor in determining our selling price. We have a storage rate in Portland that is just about half of what we have to pay in Oakland, San Francisco, and Los Angeles, and much less than half of what we have to pay in San Diego.

It seems to me that it is not up to Congress to fix the price at which we have to sell our product. Some of our cheese is sold as new stock, some of it is carried for a short length of time, and we carry some for a long period. There is considerable shrinkage in storing cheese, and other factors enter into what price we should have for our product. As long as agriculture is in as precarious a condition as it is in at this time, it seems that we shouldn't be burdened with additional legislation such as the Robinson-Patman bill. May I hear from you on this, please?

Yours very truly,
CARL HABERLACH, Manager.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, officers of the National Cooperative Milk Producers Association last evening when I showed them the letter said it very clearly defined the situation which would obtain in many sections of the country affecting milk producers and those who are interested in the cheese business. I asked that the letter be read merely to amplify the reasons which have been suggested for offering the amendment, and now, in view of the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas, I withhold further comment at this time, and shall be glad to allow further opportunity to consider the amendment. For that reason I withdraw the amendment temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon temporarily withdraws his amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I feel it due to repeat what I thought I said a while ago, that I do not wish to imply by any statement I have made that I find myself in a position to agree to the amendment. I should like an opportunity of making a further study of it.

Mr. McNARY. Nothing that I have said would indicate that the Senator from Arkansas had accepted the amendment. I understood the Senator simply wanted a little additional time to consider the amendment before determining what course he would pursue in compliance with the request. I have temporarily withdrawn the amendment.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I desire to offer the amendment which I have lying on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington offers an amendment which the clerk will state.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 5, line 25, after the word "delivered", it is proposed to insert a semicolon and the following: "nor differentials which are based exclusively upon recognized changes in the market price of the product or products sold."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, as stated a few moments ago, I have no objection to that amendment. It is entirely consistent with the amendment agreed to that has relation to the same subject and to other subjects, and, so far as I have any authority to do so, I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. AUSTIN. I send forward an amendment which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the committee amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 5 of the committee amendment, in line 19, after the word "depending", it is proposed to strike out the word "solely", and in line 20, to strike out the words "for resale to" and substitute therefor the words "as factors."

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief explanation of the amendment. The proviso intended to be amended by this proposal now reads as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent differentials in prices as between purchasers depending solely upon whether they purchase for resale to wholesalers, to retailers, or to consumers, or for use in further manufacture.

I shall not read the remainder of it, because it does not seem to me to be pertinent to the explanation.

The fault I find with that language is that it excludes the manufacturer who has a consumer customer. I believe from the statements made on the floor by the sponsors of the measure that it is not their intention to discriminate by the bill itself against any manufacturer. The complaint I make is that this language, if it is left as it is, deals only with the sale for resale, and it does not permit a sale to a consumer customer direct from the manufacturer. The description, in other words, of the class in the proviso is too narrow. It is so precise, so specific, that it crowds out that group of business people who sell direct from the factory to the consumer.

The intention of my amendment is merely to open that up so as not to discriminate against the manufacturer who has customers who are consumers.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not sure that I understand exactly the effect of the proposed amendment. Will the Senator explain it again?

Mr. AUSTIN. On page 5, in line 19, I propose to strike out the word "solely" and in line 20 to strike out the words "for resale to" and substitute therefor the words "as factors." Then it would read:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent differentials in prices as between purchasers depending upon whether they purchase as factors, wholesalers, retailers, or consumers, or for use in further manufacture.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senator very frankly that I do not believe the word "solely" ought to be stricken out. If that should be stricken out, it would open the classification perhaps much wider than it ought to be. There is nothing to prevent classifying in different groups depending entirely upon whether the purchase is for resale by wholesalers or retailers or to consumers. If we strike out the word "solely" I am a little apprehensive it might leave the matter in condition which would not meet with my approval.

As to the other suggestion to strike out the words "for resale to" and substitute the words "as factors", I am not sure that I know what effect that would have at this time. I have listened to what the Senator said. As I understand, he feels the manufacturer cannot sell directly to the consumer. It seems to me, as I read it, that he can, whether purchased for resale to wholesalers or retailers or consumers; but the Senator from Vermont, I understand, takes the position that it must be purchased for resale to consumers and that the manufacturer could not sell directly to the consumer.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is correct.

Mr. LOGAN. To be perfectly agreeable about it, I think the manufacturer ought to be allowed to sell direct to the consumer that which he sells to others, but the use of the words "as factors" may or may not accomplish the purpose, so far as I know. I should like to know just what the Senator has in mind by the use of the words "as factors."

Mr. AUSTIN. A factor is an agent who acquires title to the goods that he sells. It only adds one more class to the group of purchasers from manufacturers. By taking out the words "for resale to" and adding the words "as factors", we make every one of those named after the word "factors" a class or a division of customers to whom a sale may be made under this proviso; that is to say, consumers would constitute such a division, retailers would constitute another, wholesalers would constitute another, and factors would constitute another. I am not particularly anxious about factors. I should like the Senator to understand that. I am anxious, however, not to interrupt and discriminate against the transaction direct between manufacturer and consumer, for that is in the public interest.

Mr. LOGAN. Will not the Senator divide his amendment into two parts? His amendment, as I see it, calls for striking out the word "solely", to which I would be opposed. The other part of it, to strike out the words "for resale to" and insert "as factors", I think should be considered separately.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am perfectly willing to divide my proposal and let the two be considered separately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont divides his amendment. The clerk will report the first amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 5, line 19, after the word "depending", it is proposed to strike out the word "solely."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, we do not agree to that. That would be an excuse for all kinds of discrimination. I cannot consent to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont to the committee amendment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Let me restate the other amendment slightly changed for the sake of accuracy of verbiage. On page 5, line 20, I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out the words "for resale to" and inserting the words "as factors, or", and after the word "wholesalers", to strike out the word "to" and insert the word "or", and before the word "consumers" to strike out the word "to", so the proviso would read:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent differentials in prices as between purchasers depending solely upon whether they purchase as factors, or wholesalers, or retailers, or consumers, or for use in further manufacture.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator be good enough to explain the effect of the proposal?

Mr. AUSTIN. The direct effect is to make it read as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent differentials in prices as between purchasers depending solely upon whether they purchase as factors, or wholesalers, or retailers, or consumers, or for use in further manufacture—

And so forth. The effect of the change is to make consumers one of the classes comprised in the proviso. The proviso as it is written narrows the class down to those who are customers from a middleman. The words "for resale to" narrow the description down to only those persons who would be the customers of a manufacturer who is selling to a wholesaler for resale or to a retailer for resale or to a customer for resale. The proposal is to include manufacturers whose consumers are customers.

Mr. LOGAN. I think I may say to the Senator from Vermont that I understand what he is trying to do and I can see no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I move to insert at the bottom of page 8, the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. After line 12, page 8, it is proposed to add the following:

(e) That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, knowingly to induce or receive a discrimination in price or terms of sale, which is prohibited by this section.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, as I understand—and I inquire of the Senator from New York whether my understanding is correct—he has offered the amendment in the form in which it was submitted to me yesterday evening.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes, sir; I have.

Mr. ROBINSON. This amendment makes the person who knowingly receives an unfair, discriminatory price also liable; and I think it is sound in principle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to have my constituents know that I have proposed the various amendments which have been worked out between us. Out of the sheaf of amendments I had, the one that has just been adopted is the only fruit that has been garnered. I wish my constituents to know that I did the best I could, but I also know when I am thoroughly licked; so I shall not offer the other amendments.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I now desire to ask for a little more light on the final proviso at the top of page 6; and I am forced to do so because of the rejection of the amendment I offered a short time ago.

It seems to me the rejection of the amendment squarely carries the intent and influence and purpose of the bill out of the field of retail merchandising and into the field of manufacture and industrial production; and that becomes a very serious question which has not been canvassed in any substantial degree at all.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], when he was discussing my amendment, referred to the fact that it related to the automotive production business. While it did not so relate in terms, it obviously would relate to automotive production; and I therefore desire to recur to automotive production for the purpose of submitting an inquiry to the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN].

At the top of page 6, the final proviso regarding the question of permitting price differentials on account of quantity is limited to cases where buyers are so few as thus to be promotive of monopoly. I wonder if the Senator from Kentucky can tell me what that means in specific terms. How few do purchasers have to become before they are inherently suspect?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Michigan that, as provided in the bill, they must be so few that their practices in securing discounts because of quantity tend to form a monopoly. The discounts which they receive by reason of the size of their purchases must be unjustly discriminatory or promotive of monopoly before the Federal Trade Commission may consider them.

I do not know at this time of a case anywhere that the language would reach. It may be that there would never be such a case; but what we had in mind in the consideration of this provision was that there might be one concern or two concerns with such purchasing power that they could buy in such tremendous quantities that they would be buying without competition, and that if such an occasion should arise, and the discounts secured by reason of large purchases would tend to promote a monopoly or be unjustly discriminatory, then the Federal Trade Commission, after hearing all parties, should have power to say, "Above a certain quantity you shall not have any quantity discounts." That is about the best I can explain the matter.

In the ordinary course of business there is nothing in the bill that prevents quantity discounts; but I realize that purchasers might be so few that not only could they drive everyone else out of business but they could destroy the manufacturer himself by coercing him into granting discounts that were unjustly discriminatory. That is my understanding of the matter; but I know of nothing that the provision was aimed at, except that a condition such as that might arise.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me trespass further upon the Senator's good nature.

The automobile industry is necessarily confined to a comparatively few producing units. If it were not thus confined, the American public would not have the advantage it enjoys today of an exceptionally high value at an exceptionally low price, and the country would not be enjoying the reflected benefit of the induced prosperity that has come from that precise formula, and a result that is constantly applauded by the Senator and his associates across the aisle as one of the great products of the present age.

It seems to me, as I read the proviso at the top of page 6, that the automotive producing industry would be perpetually at the mercy of the Federal Trade Commission whenever the Federal Trade Commission desired to investigate and determine, in its own good time and entirely on its own responsibility, that there were not enough automobile manufacturers, and therefore the quantity discounts, which are a necessary part of the cheap production of cars, must cease.

I cannot for the life of me see any advantage, in public policy or anything else, in putting a legitimate trade of that character in this constant jeopardy. What has the Senator to say about that?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not see how the provision affects the automotive trade at all, but a condition like this might arise:

Suppose, for instance, one of the large automotive companies is engaged in selling a certain fixture to the automobile trade. One company to which it sells has a purchasing power so great that it can buy in lots, say, of $10,000,000. Another company, engaged in manufacturing and selling automobiles, may be able to buy only $100,000 worth or a million dollars' worth, while the larger one could buy $10,000,000 worth. If increasingly larger quantity discounts are permitted, when one company's purchases get up to the tremendous sum of $10,000,000 while the other cannot purchase more than the amount I have stated, it would seem to me that there can be no harm in saying that in allowing quantity discounts there shall be taken into consideration how far the competitors can go, and the quantity limit shall be fixed where there will be competition.

I do not see what harm that could do to anybody. It is true that the purchaser having a tremendous power of money could perhaps force greater discounts than he was entitled to; but if he did not get any discounts at all, if the selling concern wanted his trade, the price might be made lower without discounts.

I do not see how this provision could hurt anyone. It might do this: In the sale of automobile parts, a company manufacturing automobiles might reach the point where itself it would have to go to the Federal Trade Commission because it was buying some of its parts from someone who had absolute control of the market. But I just cannot figure out how this provision could ever be used unless the competition had grown so weak that the discounts were unjustly discriminatory and monopoly might be promoted; and I do not believe the Senator from Michigan or anyone else would like to see a condition arise where monopoly might result. I know he is against that, and so am I, and so is everyone else. Then we have to lodge somewhere the discretion to determine what may create a monopoly; and we know that it will be created, if it ever is created, through the tremendous purchasing power of a few.

I say to the Senator that I believe in some instances the purchasing power now has become so great that discounts that are unjustly discriminatory are made in order to retain the trade or the custom of particular groups, or, we will say, one particular group. If that is followed to its logical conclusion, the time will come when one manufacturer will be of such gigantic proportions that the quantity discounts to him, when he goes to his full limit, will be so great that he can drive all the others out of business.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, may I interject a remark at that point?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Just a moment, Mr. President. The last example to which the Senator adverts, I apprehend, is in the field of retail merchandising.

Mr. LOGAN. I should think so; yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is it not a fact that this provision was written entirely with the field of retail merchandising in mind, and that it never was contemplated that it was intended to reach into industrial production?

Mr. LOGAN. Really that was my idea about it. However, it had to be general. We could not pick out one particular business.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand.

Mr. LOGAN. But I had no idea, until the Senator from Michigan mentioned it, that it had anything to do with the automobile industry. It might have something to do with the industry of mining. It might be that the purchasing power of some manufacturer might be so great that he could buy coal in quantity limits that would enable him to drive out all competitors, and there ought to be some power somewhere—I do not care whether it is in the Federal Trade Commission or where it is—to say to those doing that which would promote monopoly that "Through quantity discounts you shall not be allowed to create such a monopoly." I do not know just how it should be done, but this is the best effort I could make at it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has been very frank in saying that the proviso was drawn in contemplation primarily of retail merchandising and its related problems.

Mr. LOGAN. While I did not draw the measure, that has been my idea about it, and it is my idea now.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Exactly.

Mr. LOGAN. But I apprehend that if we attempt to make exemptions of particular classes of business we may run into difficulties with the Supreme Court. Congress at one time passed several laws exempting farmers from certain antitrust legislation, but the Supreme Court said, "You cannot do that." If we exempt one group, and make the law apply to another, I am afraid we may have some serious constitutional difficulty.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, let me state what I desire to urge upon the Senator. The Senator, I repeat, has frankly indicated that the primary objective of this proviso is not in the field of industrial production at all.

Mr. LOGAN. So far as I know, that is true.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Very well. Is it not also true that the invasion of the field of industrial production by this legislation was never canvassed in the committee hearings?

Mr. LOGAN. The industries had opportunity, I may say to the Senator, at all times to present their side of the case, and I would not undertake to say from memory that they did not. I am under the impression that they did; that the representatives of industry appeared before the House committee, and that some of them testified.

I do not think it was ever considered that the measure under consideration would very seriously affect manufacturers or industry of that kind, in its present form. I doubt whether it will ever seriously affect them. But conditions might arise where they would be affected by it. The evils which are apparent now, however, do not flow from that source.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But does the Senator think it is wise needlessly to invade a field not originally contemplated by the legislation when it can so easily be avoided? I think the Senator will say to me without reservation that his interpretation of the bill is that industrial producers can enjoy quantity discounts in their purchases so long as they are equivalent as between equal buyers.

Mr. LOGAN. That is correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yet when I try to state that in terms of an amendment offered to the bill the Senator says I cannot do it, and he leaves me tremendously at a loss to understand whether I am to believe his thoroughly candid assurance to me or whether I ought suspiciously to interpret his vote.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, the sale of parts to be put together by the purchaser into a completed commodity is merchandising in a very practical sense, almost in every sense, so that the distinction which the Senator makes is, in my judgment, not a valid one.

With reference to the necessity for the proviso at the top of page 6 relating to the Federal Trade Commission, I recall, although I have not the record before me now, but can state it somewhat accurately, a case in which a packing concern arranged to make purchases in quantity lots of $10,000,000, and in another year in quantity lots of $9,000,000. There was no other packing concern that could purchase in such lots. Hence the classification into the $10,000,000 grade tended to give that purchaser the powers of a monopoly.

Take another case, that of a large chain-store grocery concern purchasing $800,000,000 worth of goods annually. There is no other chain-store concern that at all approximates that one in purchases, and without some such provision in the bill as that to which I am referring it might very well secure discriminations in price because of quantity purchases where there would be no other purchaser competing. The result would be that it would acquire a monopoly, in many communities, at least, by reason of the benefits it secured through price differentials on large quantities.

There is another case which has been fully investigated by the Federal Trade Commission and which is referred to in the House committee report where one company made enormous purchases of rubber tires, always in quantity lots, where there was no competition, and where, by reason of the advantages and benefits it secured through those large quantity-lot purchases, it acquired an advantage of an average of 26 percent over the agents of the tire company that sold to the beneficiary of the price discrimination. Throughout a period of years the advantages thus derived by that one purchaser, in a class to itself, aggregated $41,000,000. Similar conditions resulted in the case of the packer concern to which I have alluded.

I am very much interested in the discussion of the Senator. I have an engagement which will compel me to leave the Senate in a few moments, and I shall have to ask to be excused, but I do not feel that there is any harm in this provision unless one bases his conclusion on the assumption that the purchaser of large quantity lots seeks to get an advantage to which he is not entitled under the bill or unless he bases his conclusion on the theory that the Federal Trade Commission will be unfair and that it will exercise an unsound discretion.

The sole object for which it may exercise this power is to prevent monopoly. The exercise of the power for that purpose is wholesome and essential unless one takes the view, as some do, that monopoly is desirable and should be encouraged. Of course, if we are to proceed upon that theory, there is no use in regulation at all, there is no value in any form of regulation. The whole theory of government regulation is the protection of the public against oppressive practices and against the results of monopoly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if the Senator can linger just long enough to permit me to put this proposition to him, I think I can summarize in a few sentences the thing I should like to have him agree to.

I share all the sentiment he expresses regarding monopoly. I am seeking no discriminatory advantage for anybody. The case regarding the tire company to which the Senator referred was corrected under existing law.

My feeling is that the bill was drawn for a specific purpose, and that we now discover many instances in which the bill applies to many situations and circumstances not directly contemplated in the first instance, when it was prepared.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I am not at all willing to admit that premise. The Clayton Antitrust Act contains terms general to all purchasers. The pending bill does not segregate any particular class of purchasers, or exempt any special class of purchasers. The same is true of the Van Nuys-Borah bill, which was adopted as an amendment to the pending bill on yesterday, and I think it is true of all the other bills on this subject which have been introduced. There is no reason for a discrimination in favor of one class of purchasers. The language of the existing law is general, and the language of the present bill is general; and the inevitable result of a proposal to except a class of purchasers would be to leave that class free to enjoy any kind of discrimination it can secure, even though it may result in monopoly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator let me finish the proposition I am trying to submit to him?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. I thought the Senator had finished.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Many industrial producers of the United States feel—let me put it that way—that this bill was not primarily intended to concern them.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think that is true as a general proposition. The bill deals with the purchase and sale of commodities.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; and because of that fact they feel that the effect of the bill in the larger basic field of industrial production has not been adequately inquired into for the sake of the protection of the legislation itself. They feel, and I feel, that this phase of the matter has been only casually touched upon in committee hearings either in the House or Senate, and that almost no considered attention has been given to it.

Here is my proposition to the Senator: The bill apparently is going to be sent to conference with the Borah-Van Nuys bill attached, there to meet the Patman bill and perhaps the Utterback bill, and there to be finally resolved by the conference committee into one adequate, wise, and completed piece of legislation. It seems to me that with that prospectus the Senator ought to be willing to let my amendment go into the conference to raise the point I am bringing to him for whatever consideration it is worth when the time comes. Otherwise it is foreclosed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is entirely true that we frequently see it happen on the floor of the Senate that an amendment is incorporated in a bill when it is expected that the amendment probably will be eliminated in conference; but it is also true that once an amendment is agreed to by either House, it becomes the duty of the conferees on the part of that House to stand upon the amendment, to insist upon its retention in the bill. Many years ago we established here that principle, namely, that conferees representing either House in efforts to adjust differences respecting legislation are in good faith obligated to carry out the will of the House by which they were chosen. So I should not like to put myself in the attitude of saying to the conferees, "I think this is an amendment consistent with the general purposes of the bill. Therefore you are instructed to urge its adoption in the final draft of the legislation."

It is true, as the Senator has suggested, that the conferees in the last instance will have to harmonize the differences between the two Houses, and in doing that they will probably work out a measure somewhat different from what either House has passed. The best I can say to the Senator is that I will give further consideration to his suggestion.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I realize that what the Senator says about Senate amendments is ordinarily true, but I think we can frankly agree that this is going to be a somewhat different kind of conference. I think we are proceeding on a different sort of basis in connection with the conference. We have taken the Borah-Van Nuys bill, which was originally intended as a substitute for the Robinson bill, and we have added it to the Robinson bill, so both of them can be there for consideration. Under the circumstances the conference will be of a little less than ordinarily binding importance insofar as Senate instructions are concerned; and, if this opportunity shall be afforded, I think the Senator will achieve in many industrial centers of the country a feeling of greater confidence in the purpose of the bill to give them all a day in court.

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall try not to conclude action on the matter just at this juncture.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an editorial published in the Labor World of April 1, 1936, bearing upon the pending question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Labor World of Apr. 1, 1936]

CONGRESSMEN, WARNING!

There are two bills now before Congress the general purpose of which seems to be to still further hamper business, and these particular bills will "restrict" chain stores, as well as many manufacturing businesses.

The Borah-Van Nuys bill is now before the Senate, and the Patman-Robinson bill, the most vicious of the two, which has just been heard before the Judiciary Committee of the House, has been reported out favorably recommended. The bill provides, in effect, that it shall be unlawful for manufacturers to "discriminate" between purchasers (such as stores) either in the price or terms of sale. It would be well for the Members of Congress to remember that this bill would undoubtedly increase the cost of living 8 to 10 percent and would be detrimental to labor. It would add almost a billion dollars to the cost of living of the American people.

Samuel Gompers, the late president of the A. F. of L., once said:

"Labor should unite to oppose any movement to advance the cost of living. Most of these profiteering movements are insincere, economically unsound, and born of the racketeer, either political or otherwise."

There is already a big stir in labor circles over these bills, and Congress will hear from labor, because at this time, when there are almost 13,000,000 people out of employment and more than 20,000,000 on relief, it is the height of insanity to increase the cost of living. Labor will not stand for it.

Throughout the depression the chain store has been a friend of the poor man, because the cost of living has been kept within reason. So why hamper them in their service to the people, or why pass additional unconstitutional legislation?

Congressman CONNERY, who is a representative of labor in Congress, is reported to have recently said that the Members of the Seventy-fourth Congress will have little to carry back to their constituents to recommend them for reelection. So why add one more black eye to the long list of deficiencies of the Seventy-fourth Congress which are bound to keep a large percentage at home?

Congressman PATMAN argues that "the real independent merchant and businessman is in favor of this bill. It is in the interest of the consumers, wage earners, and farmers, and the general welfare of the people. In truth and in fact, if the Robinson-Patman bill is enacted into law, the consumer will save billions of dollars a year", PATMAN declares. Then PATMAN goes on to cite methods used by the chain stores to get prices down, reading into the record a letter from J. M. Harris, of Texarkana, Tex. Thus PATMAN contradicts his own argument that the bill will save the consumer. It makes an absurdity of PATMAN'S whole argument, which is clothed in gross exaggeration and strong language.

The truth of the matter is, the Robinson-Patman bill will stop direct sales by the manufacturer to both the chain store and the independent merchant. It will create a middleman. It will increase costs in handling the goods. It will injure labor by causing more unemployment. It will add millions to the cost of living of the American people, and it will introduce new evil practices into American business born of deceit and such laws as PATMAN seeks to enact into law. These things alone totally condemn both these bills at this time, but it would also hamper the farmer in his dealings with his biggest customer, the chain store. Without creating an alibi for the chain store, which is now with us and part of the American system, whether right or wrong, there are a number of arguments in its favor. It connects the consumer with the door of the factory, with less waste, than any other form of merchandising. The manufacturer, particularly the small manufacturer, likes this system because it saves him the cost of selling, and it keeps his labor employed. He often knows a year in advance what his labor and other ordinary costs will be. It increases the volume of production and the number of dollars that can be paid out to labor.

The chain store is a highly competitive business, hence it continually fights to keep prices down. The chains save the consumer at least 10 percent. At the same time it has forced the independent merchant to modernize and make more efficient his own business. The live independents are not worrying about chain-store competition. The Federal Trade Commission, in its investigations, has found that the chain has held down prices to the consumer in all competing stores and that the chain has paid wages better than the average.

Labor in the country is now restless. There are strikes by the hundreds and more in the making. There are almost 13,000,000 idle workmen in the country, according to the figures of the American Federation of Labor. Labor has full knowledge of these facts and the Members of Congress who come before the people at the fall elections, and it is watching such legislation as the Robinson-Patman bill, with a vicious ulterior motive behind it, and which will undoubtedly increase the cost of living to both the wage earner and the unemployed, and with it the tax bill of the American people. The wage earner's wife, now rightly up in arms at the increasing cost of living, is already protesting. It is both economic injustice and industrial revenge. It will be well for the Members of Congress to remember the words of Samuel Gompers. It would be well for Congress to keep in mind that the food bill of the wage earner is on the climb. Labor resents it. He will have the chance to express his resentment at the polls in 1936.

These bills are also said to be unconstitutional. They will create chaos and unrest while they are pending in court. They will hamper every manufacturer in his dealings with his dealers. Labor will not stand for this stab in the back at this time when wages are not advancing as fast as the cost of living. Many wage earners are now looking on with wonder as Congress passes unconstitutional legislation. They are beginning to feel that they are being fooled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, is this the final vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall have to renew my appeal to the Senator from Kentucky, and ask him if he will not permit my amendment to go to conference, and thus give industrial production in America "a chance for its white alley."

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator indulge me for a moment until I can have the opportunity to ask whether there are any other amendments to be proposed?

Mr. McNARY. Does the Senator mean amendments to the committee amendment?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. I have one amendment which the Senator from Arkansas this morning stated he desired further time to consider.

Mr. LOGAN. That is exactly what I wished to ascertain. The Senator from Arkansas has just left the Chamber. On his return I think we can dispose of this whole matter.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am advised that there are other amendments to be offered. I know the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has an amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Oregon that in reply to my inquiry no one indicated a desire to present any further amendments. The Senator from Utah does have an amendment. Someone, perhaps, might notify the Senator from Arkansas that we have about concluded action on the amendments. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] says he has no further amendments, and, so far as I know, there are no other amendments to be offered except the one which was offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the one offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY].

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, let me address a remark to the Senator from Kentucky. Is it his opinion that the amendment I suggested this morning in behalf of the dairy industry is included in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS]?

Mr. LOGAN. It is my judgment that the amendment which was proposed by the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Indiana, and which was agreed to, allows discrimination in price to meet competition in different communities; and, as I understand, that is exactly what the Senator from Oregon proposes in his amendment. At the moment I do not have before me the Borah-Van Nuys amendment. I am quite sure it contains that specific provision.

Mr. McNARY. I shall be very happy, indeed, if the Senator will refer to that amendment, and let the RECORD contain the precise language which the Senator believes incorporates the amendment I have suggested.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I will call the attention of the Senator to the fact that there is this provision in the Borah-Van Nuys amendment:

> Nothing in this section shall prevent a cooperative association from returning to producers or consumers, or a cooperative wholesale association from returning to its constituent retail members, the whole, or any part of, the net surplus resulting from its trading operations in proportion to purchases from, or sales to, the association.

That is the provision as it relates to the association feature. I will have to read other portions of the amendment in order to find exactly what I had in mind:

> SEC. 2. It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to be a party to, or assist in, any transaction of sale, or contract to sell, which discriminates to his knowledge against competitors of the purchaser, in that, any discount, rebate, allowance, or advertising service charge is granted to the purchaser over and above any discount, rebate, allowance, or advertising service charge available at the time of such transaction to said competitors in respect of a sale of goods of like grade, quality, and quantity; to sell, or contract to sell, goods in any part of the United States at prices lower than those exacted by said person elsewhere in the United States for the purpose of destroying competition, or eliminating a competitor in such part of the United States.

That prohibits the sale in competition for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor in any part of the United States; but, as I understand, it allows prices lower than those exacted from other customers unless it is to eliminate a competitor.

That is the construction that I have placed on it. I should like to say to the Senator from Oregon that the provision which I had directly in mind is the one that is included in the bill reported to the House by the Judiciary Committee of that body. If the Senator desires to offer his amendment now, although I notice the Senator from Arkansas has temporarily left the Chamber, we will see if we cannot dispose of it at this time. I have not seen the final form of the amendment; but, in view of the fact that the House committee has such a provision in the bill reported by it, and in view of the further fact that the majority leader, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], has agreed to give the matter further consideration, and is for the moment absent, and with a view to reaching a conclusion, I will make no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon being adopted.

Mr. McNARY. I thank the Senator. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], who is greatly interested in the dairy industry, entertains the view, Mr. President, that the language in the Borah-Van Nuys bill includes the language I have suggested. The Senator is temporarily absent and so is the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS]; but, in view of the very generous and kindly attitude of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] to take the amendment to conference for the purpose of further consideration, I shall now offer the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield, so that I may present to him another amendment on the same subject and ask his opinion as to whether his amendment will be necessary if the one I now show to him should be adopted, or if that one would be necessary if his amendment should be adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from Oregon, let me say that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MOORE] seems to me to cover the point expressed in the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, but goes a little further. I can hardly see the necessity for adopting both of them; and if the one which is a little fuller, offered by the Senator from New Jersey, is satisfactory to the Senator from Oregon, I think we might let that amendment be incorporated in the bill, instead of that of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I see, from a hasty reading of the proposal of the Senator from New Jersey, that it probably does include the suggestion I have made but goes a little further. I have no objection to that amendment. I think it might be well, since it will probably be necessary to write the bill in conference, that all worth-while suggestions that may be offered should be incorporated in the bill so that the conferees may sit down and finally perfect a bill.

Mr. LOGAN. That is very fine, but it is rather cumbersome to incorporate in the bill two worthy suggestions both just alike. As a matter of fact, I have just said to the Senator from Oregon that I would make no objection to letting his amendment go in the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, there are other Senators vitally interested in the dairy industry, and I believe, before final action is taken, I must suggest the absence of a quorum so that they may have an opportunity to be present.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am compelled to attend another committee meeting and should like to have considered an amendment which I offered yesterday. It is important not only to the mining States but to the oil States and coal-producing States. Will the Senator consent that the amendment be considered at this time?

Mr. McNARY. I should be very glad to accommodate the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, following the amendment heretofore agreed to, on page 8, after line 12, it is proposed to insert the following:

(e) Nothing in this section contained shall prevent the sale or purchase of crude mineral products or metals in the form in which they are loaded for shipment at prices or terms of sale based upon differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of such products, or that make only due allowance for differences in the cost of selling or transportation, or discrimination in the price of such products in the same or different communities made in good faith to meet competition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I understand the pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KING. It is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] temporarily withdrew his amendment for the purpose of permitting the Senator from Utah to offer an amendment.

Mr. McNARY. That is the parliamentary situation.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the effect of this amendment, if adopted, as I interpret it, would be to remove minerals from the operation of the bill?

Mr. KING. Only as to quantity.

Mr. ROBINSON. With respect to quantity allotments. The proponents of this amendment contend that the proposed legislation, if enacted, would not affect them; that they would not be involved in questions of unfair price discrimination; and yet, at the same time, they ask the legislative authority to exempt them from its provisions. I do not believe in this amendment; I do not think, if adopted, it would improve the bill. The Senator from Utah feels that it would do so.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] a while ago said if we started making these exceptions that undoubtedly the bill would be declared to be unconstitutional; he made several references to that point. I do not desire to discuss any constitutional question, but I merely wanted to refer to what the Senator from Kentucky had heretofore stated.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Arkansas will yield, may I say that I have numerous authorities here showing that this classification is supported by the decisions of the Supreme Court?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I feel constrained to say that I do not believe any serious constitutional question is involved in this proposed legislation. With the distinct understanding that I do not approve this amendment, and that I shall not help to keep it in the bill unless the conferees should find it would have a wholesome and helpful effect, I am not going to make further objection to the amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have proposed this amendment in the interest of the mineral industries which are vital to our modern industrial development.

The products of our mines are bulk, basic raw materials which do not enter into the channels of retail distribution. To the best of my knowledge, the mineral industries neither sell nor purchase from chain stores. The alleged abuses in that field of merchandising do not exist in the sale of mineral products and metals, and there is no complaint that as to this important field of industry the present Clayton Act is not entirely adequate. There is no need of any remedial legislation for the mineral industry, and the proposed bill, if applied to that industry, would abrogate long-established practices which are of great importance in the systematic conduct of mineral production.

This bill would greatly hinder the mineral or metal producer in disposing of his output through long-time contracts which involve quantity-price differentials. Such contracts are essential to the orderly planning and efficient extraction of our mineral resources. Quantity sales and quantity-price differentials under existing law are essential to low costs, steady operations, stability of employment, efficient extraction of mineral deposits and utilization of large tonnages of lower grade or "marginal" ores which would otherwise be entirely lost. They are thus a potent influence in conservation of natural resources.

It is believed by many that the bill before us would limit quantity differentials to definitely provable differences in cost of production, sale or delivery resulting from quantity sales. This requirement, coming as it does within the extremely controversial field of cost accounting, would impose an impossible burden of proof upon the mine operator. Who can say what the difference in cost of production of a ton of coal may be, for example, when produced for sale in small lots only, or when produced under long-term contracts calling for many thousands of tons? Under the first condition it may not be possible to operate a mine at all, whereas the second condition will permit large-scale, efficient operations.

The proposed bill would to a large extent put the mineral or metal producer in a strait jacket and would prevent that flexibility which is essential in disposing of his product. This applies not only to the metals and their ores, to coal and other similar minerals, but to petroleum.

When oil commences to come out of the ground the lease owner, or operator, has to sell it immediately at the best price he can get. It is a rare instance where he owns adequate tankage to store it, and if he has time and financial ability to construct tankage, it would frequently not be worth while to do so, because the oil might become exhausted. The flow of the oil when once started is continuous and the owner cannot interrupt it to arrange uniformity of prices. Long-term commitments are frequently imperative to assure a continued market.

My amendment follows the language of the present section 2 of the Clayton Act, and its effect would hence be to continue mineral products and metals subject to the same degree of regulation as heretofore. The exception which it provides would cover the crude unfabricated mineral products and metals in the form in which they are loaded for shipment.

I earnestly submit the desirability of making this exception in the case of the mineral industry where the disturbance arising from the proposed legislation would be vast and widespread, and would have a most disturbing effect on the important public policy of the conservation of natural resources of this country.

I shall ask to submit for the RECORD additional facts showing the necessity for this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks statements prepared by representatives of the American Mining Congress, in respect to the amendment and in part explanatory thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statements will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PROPOSED FORM OF AMENDMENT

The source of the language of this suggested amendment is the existing Clayton Act as indicated previously; the portion of the amendment reading "crude mineral products or metals in the form in which they are loaded for shipment" has been suggested by the action of the Bureau of Internal Revenue in regulations 86 governing the income tax under the Revenue Act of 1934. In article 23 (m) 1 (g) the Bureau defines the phrase "gross income from the property" as applied to the depletion sections of the Federal income-tax law. In so doing it sought to define the status of mineral products insofar as their crude unfabricated marketable state was concerned and reference thereto will show that the principles as set forth by the Bureau of Internal Revenue in such cases are largely adopted in the proposed amendment. The purpose of such a limitation is to render only crude mineral products or unfabricated metals subject to the exception created by the amendment.

In excepting the products of the mining industry from the provisions of the proposed act and leaving them subject to the provisions of the existing law governing quantity price differentials, the mining industry will not be left unregulated but will be subject to a regulatory measure of the same sort which prompted the adoption of the existing provisions of the Clayton Act. The debates concerning section 2 of the Clayton Act appear conclusively to establish that it was intended to forbid the uneconomic practice of temporarily cutting prices in the locality of a competitor, for the purpose of driving him out of business and to establish a monopoly thereafter. The section is inapplicable, therefore, to a long-term relationship, such as generally exists in the mining industry, profitable to both of the parties, made with no intention of capturing the market and subsequently raising the price to monopolistic levels.

FACTUAL BASIS FOR A CLASSIFICATION EXCEPTING MINERAL PRODUCTS AND METALS

It is recognized that any amendment creating an exception in the case of mineral products and metals must be within the requirements of the fifth amendment; that it be reasonable and not arbitrary or capricious; that classifications to be valid must be upon recognized and established differences and that the line drawn between various classes must be definite and reasonably related to the purposes for which the regulation is designed.

It is striking that throughout the hearings on this legislation there has been no evidence which indicates that the evils and abuses, which are claimed to exist in the field of retail distribution and particularly as to chain stores, are applicable to the mining industry.

In the brief submitted by the United States Wholesale Grocers Association, one of the leading proponents of this type of legislation, the alleged evils sought to be corrected are enumerated, as follows:

"The factual data presented before the committee amply establish that these evils are prevalently found:

"(1) In the grant of quantity discounts exceeding any marginal cost differences between the customers concerned; that is, unsupported by 'differences in the cost of manufacture, sale, or delivery resulting from the differing methods or quantities in which such commodities are to such purchasers sold or delivered.' (Patman bill, p. 2, lines 17–20.)

"(2) In the payment of brokerage by the seller to dummy brokerage concerns owned and controlled by large buyers and serving the latter's interest.

"(3) In the grant of advertising and similar allowances which are either out of relation to the value of any service or facilities rendered in exchange, or which in any case result in saddling onto the seller the burden of the preferred customer's advertising cost, whereas his smaller competitors must sustain their own" (p. 247, hearing before the Committee on the Judiciary, 74th Cong., 1st sess., on H. R. 8442 et al.).

It appears significant that as to none of these alleged evils has any reference been made which relates them to the mining industry. As a matter of fact, there are definite and essential differences in the production and distribution of mineral products and metals from that of other commodities and particularly of commodities such as food, clothing, tobacco, etc., which have been brought within the chain-store plan of retail distribution. The sale of the products of mines at retail is negligible; the mining industry, to the best of our knowledge, neither sells to nor purchases from chain stores.

The products of mines are peculiarly susceptible of sales arrangements covering large quantities and long-term contracts. Virtually all minerals and metals are in the first instance bulk basic raw materials, sold in large quantities and not susceptible of general retail distribution. Some retain their characteristics as a basic raw material up to the stage where they have undergone some processing. This has been borne in mind in the form and language of the suggested amendment, which would apply to minerals and metals in the form in which they are loaded for shipment, for it is usually up to the point of shipment that minerals or metals retain their crude character.

The benefits to the mineral industry and to the public of large-quantity sales are many, including not only reduced costs of production, reduced selling and distribution expense, but in many cases the ability to schedule operations with reasonable continuity, without which it would be difficult or impossible to operate a mine at all. Consider, for example, a mineral producer who disposes of large tonnages through contracts extending over a considerable period. This assured outlet enables this producer to plan his operations systematically, keep his organization together, and give steady work to his employees, a result which could not be obtained except by his ability to quote a more attractive price on large contracts than he could quote on small-lot business.

In the field of mining the conservation of natural resources of the country is recognized as an important public policy. Today there is no partisan question as to this doctrine, and it is generally accepted that any form of legislation which directly or indirectly impairs this doctrine is inimical to the public welfare.

The inherent characteristic of minerals and metals as wasting assets largely governs the actual operations and practices of the mineral industry. Quantity sales, with their concomitant price differentials, are established and justified trade practices in the mineral field. Upon quantity sales and long-time contracts in large part depends the solution of the problems of efficient mining, better extraction, stability of employment, and the minimizing of so-called "selective mining", which may be so wasteful of the mineral resources of the Nation. Such selective mining involves, in plain language, the skimming of the cream, the taking under economic pressure only of the best.

Good management in the conduct of mineral production contemplates careful planning not for a few months or years but to extend continuously over a long period of years. A proper cost of production is dependent upon efficient mining and planning, and of great importance in such planning is the ability to dispose in the market of sufficient quantities of the product to give the cost benefits resulting from a sufficiently large continuous volume.

The effect of continuous large-scale production in accomplishing a substantial reduction in cost is well recognized. If a steady output in reasonably large volume can be maintained, it will enable the mine operator to mine a lower grade of material than would otherwise be possible, thus making available to the public a large tonnage of marginal ores which would otherwise be entirely lost. If, on the other hand, legislative restrictions on disposal of the output or other conditions are such that only the richer portions of a mineral deposit can be operated, the associated leaner portions which cannot stand the cost of being mined separately must frequently be abandoned and permanently lost. It is recognized, of course, that there are marginal mineral deposits which cannot operate at a profit regardless of the methods of selling the product; but the commercially workable mines should, in the interest of conservation of natural resources, be encouraged to extend their operations to the very lowest grade of material which can be handled. To this end quantity price differentials should not be restricted further than in the present Clayton Act.

The above problems of efficient mining and better extraction are intimately involved in the most important question of stability of employment. Certain seasonal influences are extremely important in connection with the production of some of our minerals. Thus, for example, in the case of coal, it has always been the practice to endeavor to give the best measure of employment possible in the off season of the year by making long-time contracts which contemplate the storage of coal at or near the points of consumption. In the making of such contracts it is not only necessary but wise to make some concession in price. There is a very definite reason for this. A consumer who stores coal usually assumes all cost of unloading to storage and of lifting and transporting to the point of consumption. It is only reasonable that this assumption on the part of the consumer should be met in part by the producer. A similar situation exists as to other minerals.

In the production of both anthracite and bituminous coal there is a further problem which emphasizes the necessity for quantity price differentials. Accepted practice calls for the screening of the raw product of the mines into a number of sizes, varying from a large lump down to a fine slack. It is impractical to arrange storage at the point of production for sizes not readily salable at certain times of the year. For example, a production unit which is not protected by long-time contracts for the disposition of the fine sizes in wintertime will be compelled to shut down. In order to make necessary long-time contracts flexibility in quantity differentials is essential.

There is also no need for the regulation proposed by this bill in the case of crude petroleum. With an oversupply of crude in thousands of hands there is no opportunity for the producer to oppress the buyers who are ordinarily refining companies and who usually have some production of their own. Limitation to uniform prices would be a misfortune to the producer and hamper him in his efforts to get what he can in an oversupplied market. Oil prices fluctuate rapidly, and the lot of the producer is sufficiently difficult as things are now. On resales in bulk the situation is the same. The owner of the crude must find buyers where he can and frequently has more than one buyer can take, and should not have to bring all his prices down to his distress sales. The strong companies ordinarily refine the oil produced by them and do not sell it. The regulation proposed in this bill would hamper the weaker sellers particularly. There is no relief for the crude producer in the provisions of the proposed law for differences in costs; every lease varies from every other in amount of oil, expense of production, and frequently in quality. Most producers do not keep adequate or complete cost accounts.

Not only is a well, particularly a deep well, expensive to drill, like sinking a mine shaft, but the holder of several leases who finds oil on one must ordinarily drill the others or lose them or be subject to various liabilities. He must drill if his neighbors drill and keep up continuous production or lose the oil to wells offsetting his property. Oil flowing from one property to another belongs to the first person who takes it out. In a race like this none of them can wait for a market, or insist on his own price, or meet the uniformity of price contemplated by the proposed law.

Even if a producer has use or a market for one kind of oil, he may get oil of other characteristics which he must sell at the best price he can get or as to which he cannot wait to establish a uniform price. He will probably also have natural gas and "casing head", or natural gasoline, which he must market for what he can or else let go to waste. He must have freedom of sale for all products that come out of the ground, however varying in quantities or types, otherwise there will be uneconomic waste because of inability to store.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have formally proposed an amendment which was read from the desk a few moments ago, and I said that I desired to suggest the absence of a quorum, but I now see the two Senators present whom I wanted to have in the Chamber when the amendment was considered.

I should like now to ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], who is always interested in the dairy industry, if he thinks the amendment I have offered is included within the provisions of the Borah-Van Nuys amendment?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not want to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. I have propounded a question to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. MURPHY. May I ask the Senator from Oregon to restate the question he addressed to me?

Mr. McNARY. I asked if, in the opinion of the able Senator from Iowa, the amendment which I proposed is embraced within the provisions of the Borah-Van Nuys amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. We are transacting business with very few Senators present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield for that purpose?

Mr. McNARY. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Clark	Holt	O'Mahoney
Ashurst	Connally	Johnson	Overton
Austin	Coolidge	Keyes	Pittman
Bachman	Copeland	King	Pope
Bailey	Couzens	La Follette	Radcliffe
Barbour	Davis	Lewis	Reynolds
Barkley	Dieterich	Logan	Robinson
Benson	Donahey	Lonergan	Russell
Bilbo	Duffy	Long	Schwellenbach
Black	Fletcher	McGill	Sheppard
Bone	Frazier	McKellar	Shipstead
Borah	George	McNary	Smith
Brown	Gerry	Malopey	Steiwer
Bulkley	Gibson	Metcalf	Thomas, Okla.
Bulow	Glass	Minton	Thomas, Utah
Burke	Guffey	Moore	Tydings
Byrnes	Hale	Murphy	Vandenberg
Capper	Harrison	Murray	Van Nuys
Caraway	Hastings	Neely	Walsh
Carey	Hatch	Norris	Wheeler
Chavez	Hayden	Nye	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] to the committee amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I had propounded an inquiry to the able Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], which I should like to have him answer at this time.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I find nothing in the amendment as the Senator from Oregon proposes it which is at variance with the spirit, not of the Robinson bill but of the Borah-Van Nuys amendment, which the Senate adopted yesterday. It would appear, however, that the situation against which the Senator from Oregon so zealously seeks to guard is guarded against effectually in the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Indiana.

For the benefit of Senators who may not have knowledge of the situation it may be stated that the National Milk Dealers' Association does an interstate business, selling milk, we will assume, in Camden, N. J., in Scranton, Pa., and in New York City. The prices asked for the milk in each of the three cities may differ.

It appeared under the language of the Robinson bill that it would be obligatory upon that milk dealers' association, because it is engaged in interstate commerce, to sell its milk in each of those cities at the same price, and it would not in those circumstances be able to reduce its price in any city to meet local or intrastate competition there.

The Borah-Van Nuys amendment, it seems to me, covers the situation in this language, and I read from page 2, beginning in line 7, of the Borah-Van Nuys amendment:

> To sell, or contract to sell, goods in any part of the United States at prices lower than those exacted by said person elsewhere in the United States for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor in such part of the United States; or to sell, or contract to sell, goods at unreasonably low prices for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor.

It appears to me, from my reading of that provision, that if the National Milk Dealers' Association should sell at a lower price in one city than in another milk shipped in interstate commerce to meet the competition of intrastate commerce, it would fall within its rights in so doing and would not be guilty of a violation of the provisions of this measure.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon is fully in accord with the spirit of the Borah-Van Nuys amendment. I would reply to him that in my view—and this statement is made after reference to and consultation with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS]—the Borah-Van Nuys amendment covers the situation entirely, but there is nothing, as I read it, objectionable in the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon and, without harm to any interest, it could be adopted.

Mr. McNARY. I thank the Senator for his response to my inquiry.

Mr. MURPHY. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] to correct any error of statement I may have inadvertently fallen into in my response to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, I concur entirely in the statement just made by the Senator from Iowa. I think the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon is in entire keeping with the intendment of the so-called Borah-Van Nuys amendment. I think it is in the bill already without his amendment, but his amendment would clarify the situation. So far as I am personally concerned, I shall be very happy to have the Senate adopt the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, independent of any language which might limit or modify the clause proposed by the Senator from Oregon, I should think it might be construed as somewhat inconsistent with the general purposes of the proposed legislation; but the language which has been quoted by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], contained in the amendment already agreed to, would modify and restrict the application of the language contained in the amendment of the Senator from Oregon so that no discrimination could be granted or permitted that had for its purpose and its effect the elimination of competition.

Without that modification I should doubt the value of the amendment, although I recognize that it is intended for a wholesome purpose. I think the latitude would be too broad if we merely said that "nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price in the same or different commodities made in good faith to meet competition." The authority thus granted might be employed notwithstanding there was an effort to meet competition in ways that would be questionable; but so long as the provision cannot be used as a means of destroying or eliminating competition, I do not see how it can be harmful.

Of course, the conferees may conclude to retain the provision of the Senator from Oregon and eliminate the Van Nuys-Borah provision, in which event I should have consented to a modification of the bill that is, in my judgment, not wholly consistent with the purposes of the proposed legislation; but on the assumption that both provisions are to be retained, I think no damage can result, and it may prove beneficial. So I shall not interpose an objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, there remains one element of controversy and, I think, only one.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] has been very gracious in presenting his amendment, and he has been very insistent on having it incorporated in the bill. I have stated to the Senate that I am not confident that the amendment is valuable; that I mistrust it insofar as it relates to what may be termed one class of sales and purchases. After all, however, that is a limited class. The Senator has appealed to have the matter considered in conference. I have been advised by my colleague, who has so ably assisted in connection with this bill, that he thinks it would be very well to have the Vandenberg amendment go to conference. In consenting that that shall be done, I wish to make it clear to the Senator from Michigan, as I did to the Senator from Utah, that my judgment does not approve the amendment; but I also recognize the fact that my judgment might be erroneous. A good many persons have believed it has been in times past.

With the understanding that I am not personally committed to the amendment and that the conferees may have liberty to do what they believe is fair and consistent with the interest of good and sound legislation, I am going to withdraw my objection, and if the Senator chooses to submit his amendment again I shall not object to it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. All I am seeking is to have a fair opportunity in conference for consideration of the merits of the argument I have submitted.

I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment was rejected be reconsidered.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Michigan? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Now I submit the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, as follows:

On page 5, line 17, of the committee amendment, insert the following:

Provided, That where such commodities are sold for use in further manufacture and in the production of a new product to be sold to the public, nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price by reason of differences in quantity of the commodity sold.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, on behalf of the milk producers of New Jersey, I find it necessary to offer the amendment, which the clerk has at his desk, and which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 6, line 14, after the word "trade", it is proposed to insert the following:

(e) Upon proof being made, at any hearing on a complaint under this section, that there has been discrimination in price, or services or facilities furnished, the burden of rebutting the prima facie case thus made by showing justification shall be upon the person charged with a violation of this section, and unless justification shall be affirmatively shown, the Commission is authorized to issue an order terminating the discrimination: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall prevent a seller rebutting the prima facie case thus made by showing that his lower price or the furnishing of services or facilities to any purchaser or purchasers was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor, or the services or facilities furnished by a competitor.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, all over the United States there has been great difficulty about the prices of milk. In New Jersey that was true. The producers of milk in New Jersey were starving. At the time I had the honor of being Governor of New Jersey we had a milk-control board. Prices were made that would permit these men just to live. The difference between poverty and prosperity was just 1 cent.

We have built up this system in New Jersey, in New York, in Pennsylvania, and possibly in other States of the Union. The milk producers in New Jersey feel that unless this amendment is adopted all of their work for all these years will mean nothing; that they will go back again to where they were. The amendment merely provides that if they charge more to one person than to another, or are accused of discrimination, they shall have a right to prove justification. I think the amendment goes just a little farther than the Borah-Van Nuys amendment or the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY].

On behalf of these people, who today have telephoned me, and who fear they are going to be thrown back, perhaps, to where they were, and have asked me to offer the amendment, I do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey appears to be consistent with the McNary amendment and other amendments which have heretofore been agreed to. There is one feature of the amendment about which I am in doubt; and little opportunity is afforded to study the proposition, as I have not seen the amendment before it was brought forward here. I see no objection to its incorporation in the bill, so that the conferees may consider it along with the McNary and Austin amendments which have heretofore been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he will not accept an amendment on page 5, line 9, after the word "are", to insert the words "manufactured or produced and."

Mr. ROBINSON. Then it would read as follows:

Where such commodities are manufactured or produced and sold for use, consumption, or resale.

Mr. HALE. It would eliminate from the operation of the law goods that come in from other countries. Yesterday I put in the RECORD a letter showing the effect of the proposed legislation on one of our existing industries, which my amendment, I think, corrects.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not believe the amendment is necessary, but in view of the explanation the Senator has made, I see no objection to it.

Mr. LOGAN. I think it is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

PREVENTION OF UNFAIR PRACTICES AND MISLEADING ADVERTISING

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time that Senate bill 3744, to amend the act creating the Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes, be made the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the bill shall be taken up, it is not my purpose to proceed with it today. I should like to have it before the Senate so that Senators may have the opportunity of studying it. I should like also to have a conference report disposed of, after which unless there is some routine business to be transacted, it is my intention to move a recess until Monday.

Let me add that I do not think Senators have ever had so much office work as they now have. I know there are in my office literally hundreds of letters which I have not even been able to read because I have not had the time to do so, and I should like to have a little time for consideration of business outside of the Senate. So I am intending to move a recess until Monday, unless something arises to prevent.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I was about to inquire of the Senator from Montana whether he desired to have the Senate proceed with his bill today. If so, I should object to taking up the bill. In view of the statement of the Senator from Arkansas, I do not object, except to the manner in which the Senator makes his proposal. I think the Senator should move that the bill be taken up, rather than ask unanimous consent.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3744.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3744) to amend the act creating the Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes, which had been reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce with an amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement with reference to the bill so that when Senators come to study the hearings and reports between now and the time we proceed actually to consider the bill they may better understand it.

This is a measure which was recommended by the Federal Trade Commission. We held hearings before the Committee on Interstate Commerce for several days. The committee reported the bill with one amendment, eliminating one of the most controversial features from the bill.

Stated generally, the purpose of the bill is as follows: When the Federal Trade Commission Act was originally passed it was hoped by the Congress, as committee reports will show, that it would give the Commission power to stop certain unfair and deceptive practices if they were against public interest and were detrimental, regardless of whether or not they resulted in financial injury to some competitor.

The Supreme Court, in construing the law, held that it was necessary to show that some competitor was financially injured. In one case which went to the Supreme Court the case of Federal Trade Commission against Raladam Co., the Commission attempted to stop the advertisement and sale of a reducing compound composed of a drug which was found to be actually harmful to the public if not taken under the advice of a physician. The Supreme Court said of this drug:

Findings, supported by evidence, warrant the conclusion that the preparation is one which cannot be used generally with safety to physical health except under medical direction and advice.

But the Court held that because of the fact that there was not a showing made that some competitor had been definitely injured they could not sustain the Commission's cease-and-desist order.

Two of the Federal Trade Commissioners testified before the committee, Commissioner Davis and Commissioner Freer, and the chief counsel, Mr. Kelly. Mr. Ferguson, the acting chairman of the Commission, wrote a letter recommending the passage of the bill, pointing out that many acts and practices which are unfair and deceptive to the public are at present beyond the power of the Commission because of the ruling by the Supreme Court. In the case of false advertising, the Commission has no way of stopping it unless it can be shown that some competitor is injured through the unfair advertising or practice.

Notwithstanding the fact that the practices may be injurious to the public health, notwithstanding the fact that the advertisements or practices may be misleading and fraudulent upon their face, the Commission is powerless to intercede in behalf of the public unless it can be shown that some competitor is injured.

It is said that in 99 cases out of 100 before the Commission it can be shown that some competitor is injured, but that the Commission has to spend most of its time and most of its money trying to find out how some competitor was actually injured in dollars and cents. It is said that it is difficult many times to show that fact, but they have to show it, at a great deal of expense to the Commission, and most of their time and most of their money is spent in that way.

When the Federal Trade Commission finds a case of that kind, they simply issue a cease-and-desist order. They say in effect to the company, "This is an unfair trade practice; it is an unfair advertisement, and you must cease and desist from doing this in the future."

If the respondents are not satisfied, or if the Commission wants to enforce the order, the case must be taken to the circuit court in the particular district where the company is located, and the matter adjudicated in the courts.

One other provision of importance is that persons are included in the bill as well as corporations. No member of the committee could see any reason why, if an individual were engaged in some practice complained of, he should not be amenable to the law just as a corporation would be.

I want to impress upon Senators that, notwithstanding the fact that there has been some propaganda against the bill, it does not fundamentally change the present law excepting insofar as it gives the Commission the right to say to a person engaged in a practice complained of, "You must cease and desist from this practice, in the public interest, notwithstanding noninjury to a competitor."

There has never been any difficulty with the newspapers, because it has been shown that when a newspaper was notified that in the opinion of the Commission some practice was unfair, the newspaper has voluntarily stopped printing the advertisement pending the outcome of the investigation of the Commission, and signed a stipulation to abide by the order of the Commission.

I have stated practically the only substantial provisions in the bill. There were one or two minor amendments about which there was no controversy of any kind.

TERM OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT AT PANAMA CITY, FLA.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Committee on the Judiciary has unanimously reported House bill 9244, providing for the establishment of a term of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Florida at Panama City, Fla. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. I understand the bill designates a certain city in Florida in which a term of district court is to be held. It is a House bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes, Mr. President. No expense to the Government is involved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a term of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Florida shall be held annually in Panama City, Fla., on the first Monday in October: Provided, That suitable rooms and accommodations for holding court at Panama City are furnished without expense to the United States.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar of nominations.

There are a number of treaties on the calendar, one of which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] desires to have considered.

CONVENTION FOR PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS AND GAME MAMMALS

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask to have considered at this time Executive A (74th Cong., 2d sess.), a convention between the United States of America and the United Mexican States for the protection of migratory birds and game mammals, signed at Mexico City, February 7, 1936.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider Executive A (74th Cong., 2d sess.), a convention between the United States of America and the United Mexican States for the protection of migratory birds and game mammals, signed at Mexico City, February 7, 1936, which was read the second time, as follows:

CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE UNITED MEXICAN STATES FOR THE PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS AND GAME MAMMALS

Whereas some of the birds denominated migratory, in their movements cross the United States of America and the United Mexican States, in which countries they live temporarily;

Whereas it is right and proper to protect the said migratory birds, whatever may be their origin, in the United States of America and the United Mexican States, in order that the species may not be exterminated;

Whereas for this purpose it is necessary to employ adequate measures which will permit a rational utilization of migratory birds for the purposes of sport as well as for food, commerce, and industry;

The Governments of the two countries have agreed to conclude a convention which will satisfy the above-mentioned need and to that end have appointed as their respective plenipotentiaries: The Honorable Josephus Daniels, representing the President of the United States of America, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and the Honorable Eduardo Hay, representing the President of the United Mexican States, General Lázaro Cárdenas, who, having exhibited to each other and found satisfactory their respective full powers, conclude the following convention:

ARTICLE I

In order that the species may not be exterminated, the high contracting parties declare that it is right and proper to protect birds denominated as migratory, whatever may be their origin, which in their movements live temporarily in the United States of America and the United Mexican States, by means of adequate methods which will permit, insofar as the respective high contracting parties may see fit, the utilization of said birds rationally for purposes of sport, food, commerce, and industry.

ARTICLE II

The high contracting parties agree to establish laws, regulations, and provisions to satisfy the need set forth in the preceding article, including:

(A) The establishment of closed seasons, which will prohibit in certain periods of the year the taking of migratory birds, their nests or eggs, as well as their transportation or sale, alive or dead, their products or parts, except when proceeding, with appropriate authorization, from private game farms or when used for scientific purposes, for propagation, or for museums.

(B) The establishment of refuge zones in which the taking of such birds will be prohibited.

(C) The limitation of their hunting to 4 months in each year, as a maximum, under permits issued by the respective authorities in each case.

(D) The establishment of a closed season for wild ducks from the 10th of March to the 1st of September.

(E) The prohibition of the killing of migratory insectivorous birds, except when they become injurious to agriculture and constitute plagues, as well as when they come from reserves or game farms; provided however, that such birds may be captured alive and used in conformity with the laws of each contracting country.

(F) The prohibition of hunting from aircraft.

ARTICLE III

The high contracting parties respectively agree, in addition, not to permit the transportation over the American-Mexican border of migratory birds, dead or alive, their parts or products, without a permit of authorization provided for that purpose by the government of each country, with the understanding that in the case that the said birds, their parts or products are transported from one country to the other without the stipulated authorization, they will be considered as contraband and treated accordingly.

ARTICLE IV

The high contracting parties declare that for the purposes of the present convention the following birds shall be considered migratory:

Migratory game birds:
- Familia Anatidae
- Familia Gruidae
- Familia Rallidae
- Familia Charadriidae
- Familia Scolopacidae
- Familia Recurvirostridae
- Familia Phalaropodidae
- Familia Columbidae

Migratory nongame birds:
- Familia Cuculidae
- Familia Caprimulgidae
- Familia Micropodidae
- Familia Trochilidae
- Familia Picidae
- Familia Tyrannidae
- Familia Alaudidae
- Familia Hirundinidae
- Familia Paridae
- Familia Certhiidae
- Familia Troglodytidae
- Familia Turdidae
- Familia Mimidae
- Familia Sylviidae
- Familia Motacillidae
- Familia Bombycillidae
- Familia Ptilogonatidae
- Familia Laniidae
- Familia Vireonidae
- Familia Compsothlypidae
- Familia Icteridae
- Familia Thraupidae
- Familia Fringillidae

Others which the Presidents of the United States of America and the United Mexican States may determine by common agreement.

ARTICLE V

The high contracting parties agree to apply the stipulations set forth in article III with respect to the game mammals which live in their respective countries.

ARTICLE VI

This convention shall be ratified by the high contracting parties in accordance with their constitutional methods and shall remain in force for fifteen years and shall be understood to be extended from year to year if the high contracting parties have not indicated twelve months in advance their intention to terminate it.

The respective plenipotentiaries sign the present convention in duplicate in English and Spanish, affixing thereto their respective seals, in the city of Mexico, the 7th day of February of 1936.

JOSEPHUS DANIELS. [SEAL]
EDUARDO HAY. [SEAL]

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I will state with regard to the treaty that it is similar to the treaty the United States has with Canada with regard to the same subject. The proposed treaty with Mexico, however, is more restrictive. The agreement provides as follows:

(A) The establishment of closed seasons, which will prohibit in certain periods of the year the taking of migratory birds, their nests or eggs, as well as their transportation or sale, alive or dead, their products or parts, except when proceeding, with appropriate authorization, from private game farms or when used for scientific purposes, for propagation, or for museums.

(B) The establishment of refuge zones in which the taking of such birds will be prohibited.

(C) The limitation of their hunting to 4 months in each year, as a maximum, under permits issued by the respective authorities in each case.

(D) The establishment of a closed season for wild ducks from the 10th of March to the 1st of September.

(E) The prohibition of the killing of migratory insectivorous birds, except when they become injurious to agriculture and constitute plagues, as well as when they come from reserves or game farms; provided, however, that such birds may be captured alive and used in conformity with the laws of each contracting country.

(F) The prohibition of hunting from aircraft.

The United States already, of course, has in effect all the laws which are provided for in this treaty, and Mexico agrees to enact the same kind of laws.

I ask to have the message of the President and the letter of the Secretary of State read from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
March 5, 1936.

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith a convention for the protection of migratory birds and game mammals, between the United States of America and the United Mexican States, signed at Mexico City February 7, 1936, and an exchange of notes expressing an understanding between the Governments of the two countries that ratifications are to be exchanged in Washington and the convention will come into force on the day on which ratifications are exchanged.

The convention is similar to the treaty for the protection of migratory birds in the United States and Canada signed August 16, 1916. That convention was unquestionably a great step forward toward the restoration and protection of our migratory birds. But inasmuch as numbers of species of the birds whose protection in the United States and Canada has long been provided for extend their migrations to Mexico and still farther south, and in order to protect other groups of birds which migrate between the United States and the United Mexican States, it is obvious that effective conservation requires further international cooperation. It is for these purposes that the convention with Mexico has been concluded.

The attention of the Senate is invited to the accompanying report from the Secretary of State and the comment of the Secretary of Agriculture presented therein.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

(Accompaniments: Report of the Secretary of State. Convention. Exchange of notes.)

The PRESIDENT:

I have the honor to forward to you herewith a convention between the United States of America and the United Mexican States for the protection of migratory birds and game mammals, signed at Mexico City February 7, 1936, which is being brought to your attention for transmittal to the Senate, if you approve thereof, with a view to receiving the advice and consent of that body to its ratification.

This convention, which represents the culmination of some years of negotiations, embodies the conservation principles contained in the well-known migratory bird treaty, signed at Washington August 16, 1916, for the protection of migratory birds in the United States and Canada.

The present convention limits, with certain exceptions, the taking, transportation, and sale of migratory birds and their products to a maximum period of 4 months annually in each country under a system of permits; provides for the establishment of refuge zones; prohibits hunting from aircraft; and specifically provides for a close season for wild ducks extending from March 10 to September 1 of each year.

Further, the present convention prohibits the transportation of migratory birds and game mammals, dead or alive, their parts or products, across the American-Mexican border without a permit of authorization provided by the Government of each country.

Pursuant to an understanding between the Governments of the two countries, expressed in an exchange of notes which accompanies the convention, ratifications are to be exchanged in Washington and the convention will come into force on the day on which ratifications are exchanged.

The Department of Agriculture has taken an active interest in the negotiations and has greatly assisted in the conclusion of the convention. In a recent letter to me the Secretary of Agriculture made the following comment:

"A vast stride toward the restoration and protection, indeed in some cases the rescue from extirpation, of our migratory game, and various groups of our insectivorous and other birds, was taken by the conclusion of the convention of August 16, 1916, with Great Britain, for the protection of birds migrating between Canada and the United States. But as numbers of species of these birds, both game and nongame, extend their migrations and winter dispersals to Mexico and beyond, it has been manifest that to insure their more effective conservation, as well as the conservation of other groups of birds migrating between Mexico and the United States, cooperation with the United Mexican States is not only desirable but also quite imperative, and to that end the Department of Agriculture has earnestly desired and for some years past has sought to bring about the negotiation of a convention with that Republic.

"It is with genuine satisfaction and no little anticipation that we are now informed that the consummation of our hope shortly may be realized.

"Millions of our citizens, and their numbers are growing apace, whether they be tillers of the soil, nature lovers, sportsmen, or merely those esthetically inclined, are very earnestly interested in and concerned about the conservation of our birds, and it is not too much to say that they would heartily acclaim such a convention as this.

"With Canada, the United States, and Mexico cooperating in the conservation of migratory species of birds it confidently may be expected that the perpetuity of these birds is assured against all contingencies save the untoward operations of nature."

Respectfully submitted.

CORDELL HULL.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, APRIL 30, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou Lord, who knowest the hearts of all men, come now in the fullness of Thy power and prepare us for whatever awaits us. We pray Thee to enrich our minds with wisdom and knowledge from on high; with all diligence may we perservere and discharge the obligations resting upon us. We thank Thee for the gospel of love and sacrifice which was poured out in all fullness on Calvary's Cross. Create within us clean hearts and a right spirit; and may we strive earnestly to do Thy will as revealed in the life and character of the world's greatest Exemplar, our Lord and Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

AMENDMENT OF WAR MINERALS RELIEF ACT

Mr. SMITH of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 1432) to amend section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919, generally known as the War Minerals Relief Statute.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1432, the War Minerals Claim Act, with Mr. BEAM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS].

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I have no claimants in my district, and I am not primarily concerned with this matter from the standpoint of the individual claimants; but I have made a study of the matter in these claims because of the vital bearing they have on the question of national defense. In going into these claims I have become convinced that in this case the Government has committed the most immoral thing it has ever done. The attempts that have been made to show that these claimants have been paid in full time after time demonstrates an astounding lack of knowledge of the facts in this case.

Mr. Chairman, these men were induced as a matter of patriotism and in the interest of saving this Government millions of dollars to go out and borrow money in order to develop these various properties. These people had to go to the banks and borrow the money in order to stimulate the production of the four essential products involved, without which we could not have prosecuted the war.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman said that the statement to the effect the claimants had been paid was not based upon the facts.

Mr. MAAS. I said "paid in full."

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman offset the facts as shown by my statement yesterday that they have received about $10,000,000?

Mr. MAAS. We admit they received nearly $10,000,000, but in the original instance $50,000,000 was appropriated to pay these claims. They have received less than 20 percent of what was originally appropriated to take care of them.

Mr. COCHRAN. That money was not all appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. MAAS. It was appropriated to settle these claims. Without going into details, because the matter has been well covered, what actually happened was that through technicalities in the law these people were not paid their actual losses. The loss is not only the money they borrowed, if they had to keep on paying interest, but must also include such interest payments. This is not interest on the claim, Mr. Chairman. There is a vast difference between interest on a claim and interest which is part of a claim. This interest is a part of the loss which was suffered by these people in developing the properties in an effort to carry on our part of the war.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. If a constituent of the gentleman is injured by an automobile and is taken to a hospital and has to pay a hospital bill as well as a surgeon's bill and we settle the claim 10 years afterward, is it not settling the claim by paying money spent to recover health, and would we not be just as much justified in paying interest up to the date of settling that claim as we would in paying this money to pay interest up to day of settlement?

Mr. MAAS. I think we would be justified in doing that, but those are not the facts in this case. These men borrowed money at the bank in order to carry on the development of these properties.

Mr. COCHRAN. But suppose the individual had to borrow money to pay his hospital bill? It would be interest on borrowed money.

Mr. MAAS. I think he ought to get interest, but that is an entirely different situation from this. This does not cover interest on a claim. The interest in this case is part of the claim.

Mr. PITTENGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. PITTENGER. Is it not true a jury in the automobile case referred to takes all of those things into account in awarding damages?

Mr. MAAS. Of course they would.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Is it not a fact that in this case these men borrowed the money at the direct solicitation of the Secretary of the Interior to supply war minerals in a time of great emergency in this Nation?

Mr. MAAS. Exactly; and they were assured by the Government that they would suffer no loss as a result. They were awarded contracts, and, of course, if those contracts had been fulfilled, these men would not have lost money, but within a very few weeks the contracts were canceled on account of the termination of the war. The investment which was involved was a borrowed investment. No obligation is discharged until it is paid in full. These claims have never been settled in full. It is that which we are asking to have done now.

Mr. Chairman, the thing I am concerned with particularly is the question of national defense as affected by these claims. If we should be forced into the position again where we are compelled to defend ourselves by military operations, we would still be in the same position we were at the beginning of the World War.

These products are still not produced in sufficient quantity to carry on the defense of this country, and if the Government has to go out and buy these properties and make the total investment necessary to develop them, it will cost this country not another few million dollars but hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. For the purpose of clarifying the discussion, will the gentleman distinguish between the right of an individual who had the money to put up and did put it up to receive interest and the case of an individual who had to borrow the money.

Mr. MAAS. As I understand, they are separate claims to be dealt with separately. I think, fundamentally, there is no difference, but these are cases where they did have to go out and borrow the money and have continued to pay interest at the banks on this money.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I am only suggesting to the gentleman that it is the universal practice, apparently, in claims of this class not to allow interest. I myself know of many war claims that were fully justified and the payment of which has been deferred for years and years and no interest allowed.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. And it does seem to me that if we are to vote for this legislation we ought to be told how these claims are to be distinguished from other claims.

Mr. MAAS. I may say to the gentleman that the distinction or difference is that these men have not been able to discharge their obligations. They are still at the banks, and naturally when any payment was made it had to be applied first to the interest and then to the principal, and the amount in each case left for payment on the principal was very small. These men are still burdened with these interest payments and they cannot discharge them until these claims are paid in full. There is a vital difference between that case and the case of a man who had the money and therefore has not had to pay interest. These men cannot be relieved from this obligation to pay interest.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The gentleman thinks there is a difference?

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota another question. If the war had proceeded 2 years longer, and these claimants had made millions of dollars, at the expiration of the war would they have come to the Government and said, "We made millions of dollars; we do not want it; we will give it back to the Government; we simply entered this field to help out, not to make money"?

Mr. MAAS. The gentleman knows, if he knows anything about these claims, they would not have made millions of dollars under their contracts with the Government. They could not have made millions of dollars under the very restrictive terms of their contracts with the Government. At most, all they could have made would have been a modest return on the investment.

Mr. COCHRAN. Then they would have been one of the very few companies that helped to prosecute the war that did not make millions.

Mr. MAAS. That may be true.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. PITTENGER. Is it not the fact that all this was done under direction of the Government while the war was going on, and when the Government said, "Do what we tell you or we will commandeer your property"?

Mr. MAAS. Of course, it was done under such circumstances. In some cases the Government prevented the owners of such properties from joining the military services and insisted upon their remaining at home to operate these mines and increase their production. Now they have lost even the mines they owned before the war. It was a patriotic duty they performed as under no circumstances could they have made any large profits even if the war had lasted for several years. It was heads I win, tails you lose for the Government, and in this case it was tails for the mine operators.

To answer the question of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], I do think there is a difference between paying interest on a war claim settled years later and in the interest payments involved in this bill. In the first case, it would be a matter of reimbursement for the loss of interest which the claimant might have received if he had had the money earlier and invested it for interest. In the case involved in these claims, it is interest which these claimants have been and still are paying out on money borrowed for the benefit of and at the urgent request of the Government.

These interest payments are still being made. These claimants cannot be relieved from continuing these interest payments indefinitely unless this bill is passed or they go through bankruptcy. In the latter case we do a double injury. We force the ruination of the claimants and we force a loss upon the people who advanced the money to these people upon the pledge of the Secretary of the Interior that the Government would back them up and see that no loss resulted.

If this bill is passed no claimant will get a cent. It will all go to discharge the existing obligations at the banks. Every claimant will have suffered severe financial loss above and beyond repaying the loans and interest thereon. The Government compelled these claimants to sell their properties which they owned before the loans were made, and to apply the proceeds to liquidating these loans before the Government would contribute to their further liquidation. No claimant made a profit nor even received a salary for his efforts in developing these mines for Government use.

Billions of dollars were awarded to war contractors for the loss of profits by reason of the early termination of the war. How unfair in the light of that action to deny these patriotic citizens reimbursement for at most only a part of their actual loss. Most of these claimants lost their mines, and this bill does not compensate them for that loss, nor the loss of their time, nor for potential profits, but only for the loss on the money they actually borrowed and the actual interest paid upon such loans. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, this bill is not fairly subject to the attack that has been made upon it; and if you, my colleagues, have any confidence in my integrity of mind and soundness of judgment, I beg that you hear me and believe what I say about this bill.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] states that the all-important question involved is one of policy; that is, the Government paying interest on its obligations. To me the important question before us is that of preserving the honor and integrity of the Government by seeing that it render justice to its citizens. To turn the beneficiaries under this legislation out without relief would make me ashamed of a thing I love—my Government.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Georgia care to yield?

Mr. COX. Pardon me if I decline for the present.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] on yesterday referred disparagingly to the largest chain affected by this bill, that of the Chestatee Corporation down in north Georgia, and with your indulgence I want to say just a word about this claim.

This corporation was the property of two brothers by the name of Pratt. They had invested in it their entire life savings. It was a going concern, operating at a profit to its owners. During the World War the Government, through its agents and under the direction of Secretary Lane, went down to Georgia and practically commandeered this property. Its owners were directed and required to enlarge the plant and to increase its output, the Government insisting that it needed the ores it was mining for war purposes. These people did not have the money needed to enlarge their plant, and did not have the credit to enable them to get it, and so informed agents of the Government. They did not want to incur this hazard incident to enlarging operations, but were practically forced to do so, but after being insured of protection against loss Secretary Lane induced Ashcraft & Wilkinson, of Atlanta, Ga., to finance them. Ashcraft & Wilkinson were not bankers and were not engaged in the money-lending business, but were conducting an entirely different enterprise. They did not have the money, but had good credit, and went out and borrowed the money.

Mr. SMITH of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Georgia 5 additional minutes.

Mr. COX. They went to the banks and borrowed considerably more than $600,000, which they loaned to the Chestatee Corporation, under the assurance by the Government that they would be protected against loss.

Every penny of the money that has been paid to Pratt Bros. has gone to their creditors.

Ashcroft & Wilkinson still owe the banks a part of the money they borrowed to loan the Pratts. They have paid not only all the money that they have gotten from the Pratts under the legislation to relieve them but they have paid their own money and are still paying it.

To defeat this bill would not only ruin Pratt Bros. but would ruin Ashcroft & Wilkinson, who had no interest in the operation of the mining concern and no thought of profit in what they did.

Gentlemen, the proposition is just this: The Government comes to you and tells you it needs for war purposes the entire output of your mining plant. It commands you to enlarge it. You have not the necessary money and nowhere to get it, but the Government provides a lender. You create a heavy obligation, enlarge plant, and increase output, and after this is done the Government cancels its contract and leaves you with the bag to hold. What would you do? What could the Pratts or Ashcroft & Wilkinson do but obey the commands of the Government; and are they to be blamed for wanting the Government to keep its contract with them?

If this bill is passed not a dime goes to Pratt Bros., for they are already ruined. It simply enables them to discharge their obligations to their creditors who loaned them money to do that which the Government compelled them to do. They have lost their property and are not reimbursed under the bill.

My opinion is that there never has been presented to this House any claim having a better moral justification than this bill. [Applause.] If you will read the record of the hearings on the bill you will support it. It is a clean bill, and I hope it will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT].

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] who has just spoken, is not only an honest man, but an astute lawyer, and he has made a most able and correct statement of this whole matter. It seems to me it is very clear and unmistakable to anyone who studies the legislation that the agreement between the Government and these claimants was a clear contract, which no one could possibly misunderstand. The only reason that the claimants were able to carry out the mining operations at the command of the Government and secure the credit was because both the claimants and their creditors were assured by the Government of the United States that they would not suffer loss if they would cooperate in the prosecution of the war. I dislike to disagree with my good friend from New York [Mr. TABER] but I think he is entirely wrong on this particular claim. This is a meritorious piece of legislation and I trust that every Member of the House who still believes in the sanctity and inviolability of a contract and wants to see the Government keep its word with its own citizens, will vote for the passage of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, reference has been made yesterday and today in the course of this debate to a claim of a certain claimant who lives in Virginia, and the incident hardship that has come to this young man as a result of the fact he was drafted during the period of the war to develop these mining interests. The facts have not been exaggerated, in fact, they have been understated. The young gentleman in question, and he is not a great deal unlike most of these claimants, was called into this particular service or rather induced to go into it because of his knowledge and understanding and special training that equipped him to do this job that had to be done. He did not have the money. He borrowed the money and incurred obligations, and the Government, your Government and my Government, as it too often does, has been extremely dilatory in taking care of its contractual and moral obligations. I have often said that no private industry, no business could live, if it was as dilatory to its obligations as the Government. I want to express my gratification at the sentiment of the Committee today as compared with what it was when this bill was brought up before. I have said time and time again, as a result of my experience in this body of 14 years, that the mistakes we make as a legislative body, and we make them sometimes, nearly always occur when we act hastily and without deliberation and information. Today the House has information on this claim and we find there is no partisanship, there is no geographical division, and the membership of this body, I believe, with a degree of unanimity seldom witnessed, is now determined to do belated justice to these claimants.

What happens after the money is paid? These people will be able to discharge some of these obligations to the banks, and to have their homes and personal property released for the first time, and they will be able to take up their existence which was broken when they entered into this service. I join with all in every opportunity to curtail expenses and to defeat unnecessary expenditures and unjust claims. On the other hand, I feel just as enthusiastic and just as interested to try to help some American citizen get his honest, just dues from the Government when I am convinced that that is the case. I am thoroughly convinced of the merits of this claim. The passing of this bill will send the claim to the Secretary of the Interior to adjudicate and pay these claims in accordance with the sentiment of the Congress when it passed the last amendment to the act. [Applause.]

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. GEARHART].

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Chairman, the claims that are embraced in this bill are claims which this Congress in the act of March 2, 1919, agreed should be paid. That act directs the reimbursement of the war mineral relief claimants for "expenditures made and obligations incurred", and if at that time the then Secretary of the Interior had allowed and paid those claims as that act clearly intended, we would not be here now giving consideration to the measure now before us. All of these claims would have been settled in 1919 if the legal advisers to the then Secretary of the Interior had not misadvised that official in respect to the interpretation of the phrase "obligations incurred." Those legal advisers informed the Secretary erroneously that "obligations incurred" did not include the accruing interest upon promissory notes signed by the claimants and delivered to third party creditors, notes that they signed in order to finance the various enterprises which the Secretary of the Interior urged them to embark upon in furtherance of our cause in the war.

Pursuant to this erroneous interpretation of the law the Secretary of the Interior disallowed the interest accruing on these notes on the sole ground that the phrase "obligations incurred" was not sufficiently comprehensive to include such items. Because he would not allow a claim based on interest accruing on the note obligations, incurred as aforesaid, it became necessary for the claimants to return to Congress to secure legislation which would grant a right of appeal from the decision of the Secretary of the Interior to the courts. That act was promptly passed by the Congress, the justice of such a course being apparent. When the right of appeal was established as a consequence of the passage of this act of February 13, 1929, the claimants were compelled to assume the additional burden of prosecuting their cases to a decision on the mooted points through the courts.

The litigation, initiated in the courts of the District of Columbia, finally, in 1933, reached the Supreme Court of the United States, from which decisions settling the various points in controversy were ultimately handed down. The decisions, in effect, held that the claimants were, and from the very beginning had been, correct in their contention that the phrase "obligations incurred" included interest accrued and accruing upon notes executed by the respective claimants and delivered to third-party creditors to obtain the necessary funds to finance the various mining operations entered upon at the earnest behest of the then Secretary of the Interior, the Honorable Franklin K. Lane, who, it must be said in justice to his memory, during his lifetime did everything within his power, limited as he was by faulty legal advice, to deal justly with those who now address their appeal to this honorable body.

But the Court further held that the enactment of the act of March 2, 1919, the act which granted the right to file claims, fixed a "stop date", that is, a date beyond which, under that law, accruing interest could not be allowed.

In the contemplation of the situation in which these claimants now find themselves, because of the delays incident to judicial procedure over which they had no real control, let it be remembered that it was not until 1933, when the Supreme Court spoke, that a definition of their rights under the law of March 2, 1919, could be obtained.

Just what are the claimants now asking you to allow them? Merely that which you agreed to give them in 1919 plus interest which has accrued on the notes while the litigation pended, interest that has accumulated from the date of the passage of the act of 1919 down to the date of the enactment of the bill which we have before us today for consideration.

These claimants have been diligent in the prosecution of their claims. They have stood up bravely in defense of their cause, meeting every situation as it developed courageously. Their resources are now exhausted. If we fail them today, they will not be able to return another day. If we deny them that which they are so justly entitled to, it means bankruptcy for most of them, loss of everything at a time when the palsied hand of approaching old age, with all its discouragements in the contest for rehabilitation, is felt upon their shoulders.

In the name of the God who gave us life, will this great country, whom they served faithfully and well, desert them now? [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, during the course of the debate on the pending legislation the argument has been frequently advanced that the claimants have already been fully reimbursed upon any obligations which the Government may have owed them and that that which they are now seeking is interest upon claims long ago settled, interest upon which was denied them.

Each of these contentions is completely without foundation. In order to make apparent the meritory nature of the claims involved, permit me to refer to just one of them, with the facts of which I am entirely familiar. In the claim which I have in mind the claimant, at the request of the Secretary of the Interior, incurred for the benefit of the Government obligations in the amount of $97,000, evidenced by several promissory notes. When the war abruptly ended the enterprises which he had embarked upon at the behest of his beloved country immediately collapsed, leaving him entirely without funds with which to satisfy the notes. When bankruptcy was staring him in the face Congress created the War Minerals Commission, which for the first time offered him a ray of hope of financial rehabilitation. However, the claim which he filed pursuant to law did not fare well at the hands of those who passed upon it. First, the Commission offered him $2,000 in complete settlement. This he indignantly refused to accept. Three weeks later he was tendered $22,022, which, in accordance with the understandings then arrived at, was accepted by the claimant in part payment. This was 1919.

In 1923 the claim was reopened by the Commission, and items of loss which had been previously disallowed in 1919 were reconsidered and ordered paid in the additional sum of $39,000. After a lapse of years, in 1934, while discussion as to items of loss and interpretation of the act were taking place, the Commission again reviewed the claim, this time allowing additional items that had theretofore been disallowed. Allowance was made upon these items, together with interest on obligations incurred during the war period down to March 2, 1919, in the sum of $24,500. These partial payments, consisting of three, made to the particular claimant I have in mind, at no time were sufficient in amount to fully discharge the claimant's interest-bearing obligations, together with the interest that had accrued and which was to thereafter accrue upon the reduced balances.

The original principal claim has never yet been fully paid by the War Minerals Commission to the claimant, let alone the large sum of interest which has accumulated during the 17 years intervening.

When these successive awards were made this particular claimant paid the entire amounts received to the reduction of his obligation to his own creditors, and they, pursuant to usages well established, applied the sums so received first to the satisfaction of the interest already accrued and the balance to the reduction of the principal indebtedness.

This simple process accounts for the balance which still remains due and which today constitutes the subject of his claim.

In contemplating the fact that to be "made whole" is all that he is asking for, we must bear in mind that the claimant never received any compensation from the Government for his service to it during this period when our common country was in the dire distress incident to war. Not a cent has been paid to him in satisfaction of any claim for prospective or possible profits upon the mining operations initiated. Because of this unjust burden which he has been compelled to bear during all of these years he today finds himself with head barely above water, grasping at the last straw. The unfortunate predicament in which he finds himself today is attributable entirely to an indifference to his condition by the beloved country which verges upon ingratitude, the country he served so faithfully and well when it was beset by enemies at every side.

In the name of simple justice the claims that are embraced in this bill ought to be paid. This bill ought to pass with the unanimous vote of the Chamber.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. PITTENGER].

Mr. PITTENGER. I only want to call one more thing to your attention in addition to what I said yesterday, and that is the personnel of the Committee on Mines and Mining, which heard the witnesses and which brought out a favorable report. If you are not going to stand by your committees, then what is the use of having committees? I submit to the Members of this House that Honest JOE SMITH, chairman of this committee, and the other distinguished members who serve with him and who examined and cross-examined these witnesses, and who brought out a favorable report, ought to be sustained by the Members of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I hope that the Members of the House will inform themselves concerning the above measure. There are some three or four claimants in Minnesota, and in view of their interest in this legislation I have made a careful study of it.

The measure is meritorious, and in view of misinformation which was given us on the floor of the House last July when the question of adopting a rule on a companion House bill was under consideration, I think the membership of the House ought to have the facts correctly stated to them.

There are many claimants, but every one of them have about the same background. Let me discuss one of the larger claims.

Back in 1917 a couple of brothers were conducting mining operations and were in fair financial circumstances. They had opened up and were operating a mine on a small scale, and were doing it profitably. When the submarine boats interfered with ocean shipping it became necessary for the United States to get some of its war minerals here at home, and that meant that mines had to be opened up and developed and operated. These men were called upon by the Secretary of the Interior, Franklin K. Lane, to tremendously increase production, and this involved a large outlay of money. They had to borrow it. Secretary Lane assisted them in having responsible people loan them money as a matter of patriotic duty. He promised that the Government would see to it that they did not lose in this mining venture. The Government had to have the war minerals, and had to have them promptly. A large sum of money was borrowed and mining operations started on a large scale. Then the World War stopped suddenly. These men were left with a lot of debts to pay, with property that no longer had value. It was useless because the war minerals were not needed. Financially these men were ruined.

I do not here discuss the history of the war minerals legislation, but over a period of years their losses were partially paid. I have seen their records and statements and the Government still owes them money as a result of the mining operations undertaken by the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. No Member of this House will vote against the measure if he will take the time to let some of these claimants give him the facts and circumstances that have made necessary the introduction of Senate bill 1432.

An answer to the Comptroller's letter of March 13, 1936, page 6391 of the RECORD, is attached hereto.

The second letter of the Comptroller, dated April 20, 1936, page 6392 of the RECORD, may be answered by saying that the Comptroller believes that two wrongs should make a right. Here the Comptroller states that there was no legal liability on the part of the Government to pay these claims. As a matter of fact, the act of October 5, 1918, which appropriated $50,000,000 as a revolving fund in these matters, permitted claimants to go into any Federal court for "just compensation", for property taken over, and so forth, if they were not satisfied with the finding of the Administrator. This right to go into any Federal court existed for 2 years after the passage of the act of October 5, 1918. But this act was not administered. Instead the War Minerals Relief Act of March 2, 1919, was approved, which provided that claimants should have their "net losses." The claimants thereupon filed claim under the act of March 2 and disregarded their legal rights under the act of October 5, 1918.

In both letters the Comptroller seeks to show that reimbursement by the Government of a claimant's item of interest paid or obligated on borrowed money in his wartime operations—which admittedly is part of his net loss—is identical with payment of interest on an amount claimed by a claimant against the Government. In one case the item is not interest as such on a claim but merely an item of interest paid out of pocket by a claimant which is part of several items of net loss in his claim, and the other would be an allowance of interest by the payor upon the amount of a claim. The two propositions are entirely different, yet the Comptroller in his letter seeks to make them identical.

In the general debate, as reported in the RECORD, the opposition, particularly Mr. TABER, seek to show that because Congress appropriated $8,500,000 in the 1919 act from the original appropriation of $50,000,000 in the 1918 act that no claims should be paid in excess of this original $8,500,000 estimate. As a matter of fact, the total amount of claims filed under the 1919 act was approximately $19,000,000. Obviously, the $8,500,000 could not satisfy these if a proper construction of the law showed that the claims were just and equitable.

Owing to erroneous constructions of the law by the Secretary of the Interior, Congress was obliged to pass the amendment of 1921, which was predicated upon a committee report, which said, in part, speaking of the Secretary's administration of the 1919 act, that—

> He had misconstrued the law and misapplied the facts to the law.

It was for this reason that Congress passed the act of 1921.

But the Secretary still continued to disallow certain items of net loss, and upon the courts in 1924 shoving that he had so done, the Congress by the act of June 7, 1924, "withdrew the limitation on the appropriation heretofore named in the act of 1919 for the purpose of enabling the Secretary to pay adjudicated claims."

Six months later the Supreme Court held that under the act of 1919 the courts were without jurisdiction and reversed the construction of the law by the court of appeals at that time upon jurisdictional grounds only.

Then the claimants came back to Congress and, the act of 1929 was passed, which enabled claimants to go to court for a determination on questions of law theretofore decided against them by the Secretary.

There are still some 90 or 100 claims, including the interest item, under the court under the 1929 act. Many cases have been decided adversely to claimants. In the cases decided against the Government naturally payments of awards by the Secretary have been included in deficiency bills.

In December 1932 the Supreme Court held that the Secretary had wrongly construed the act of 1919 as to noninclusion of interest paid and obligated by war minerals producers in their claims for net losses. But in adjusting a claim under this rule the Secretary of the Interior decided that he could not pay said interest beyond the date of March 2, 1919, thus establishing a cut-off date. After 2 years of litigation the Supreme Court sustained this construction.

It thus appears that the construction of the 1919 act limits payments of interest on borrowed money during the war for war purposes to the said cut-off date. The act of 1919 does not suggest by its language or otherwise that a loss paid after March 2, 1919, but suffered theretofore, should not be reimbursed.

This rule is manifestly unfair to claimants inasmuch as some 90 or 100 claimants by March 2, 1919, had not liquidated their interest-bearing obligation to banks and others for credit obtained during the war, for the purpose of producing the needed war minerals at the request of the Government.

In many cases claimants paid their debts within 2 or 3 years after filing of claims from partial payments made by the Government or from funds obtained from their private sources. In certain other cases claimants had to refund their obligations or carry them because they were without private means; in other cases received no awards on their claims until 1933 or 1934, and the interest that they paid on their 1918 obligation was then only paid up to March 2, 1919. They have not yet received their out-of-pocket expenses for their interest payments made after said March 2, 1919.

The bill S. 1432 seeks to remedy this condition. It should be passed to make, in a measure, the claimants whole. The fact that there is one large claim which will absorb possibly half of the appropriation is no reason why the other 89 smaller claims should be denied justice and equity.

The passage of this bill will enable the Secretary to adjust and pay claims on the facts that shall be determined by him by the reimbursement of the item of interest paid or obligated to be paid by claimants upon the money they were obliged to borrow and which they did borrow at the request of the Government in connection with their mining operations for war purposes.

COMMENT ON LETTER OF ACTING COMPTROLLER GENERAL, MR. R. N. ELLIOTT, TO THE HONORABLE JOHN J. COCHRAN, DATED MARCH 13, 1936

Mr. Elliott's letter makes no reference to the original controlling war-minerals statute, approved October 5, 1918, the title of which is as follows:

The act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply.

The Supreme Court of the United States has ruled, in effect, in one of the test cases (288 U. S. 97), that the act of October 5, 1918, is the controlling war-minerals statute. In so ruling the Court used the following words:

Counsel for respondent (the claimant) correctly states the issue presented to the trial court. * * * Are the losses suffered for expenditures for the items involved here within the provisions of the act of October 5, 1918, as amended and supplemented by the act of October 2, 1919?

And—

With the issue as stated the only showing required is that a claim for such losses was made and that such claim was disallowed because of the belief of the petitioner (the Secretary of the Interior) that the law did not permit such allowances. (Parentheses supplied.)

Section 5 of that act provided that the Government should pay "just compensation" and conferred upon claimant the right to sue for just compensation, if such were not offered, "in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20 and section 145 of the judicial code." Clearly, therefore, at the time of the passage of section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919, the Government was liable to producers who could prove their claims, and the wording of said section 5 wherein it provided in the enacting clause for the payment of "net losses" must be fairly considered as a congressional interpretation or measure of the "just compensation" provided for in the original act.

It is true that section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919, stated that nothing in that section "shall be construed to confer jurisdiction upon any court to entertain a suit against the United States", but it did not remove the right that claimants enjoyed at that time to sue for "just compensation" under the preceding act of October 5, 1918, but claimants did not sue. They accepted in good faith the provisions made by the Congress when it passed section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919, that their "net losses" should be paid. They agreed to the provisions that in determining net losses ores and minerals and property owned by claimants might be charged against the awards. They also accepted the provision that the Government should take credit for any profits which had been earned by them. In other words, they compromised, so to speak, with the Government, waiving their right to "just compensation" and accepting in lieu thereof the right to prove and receive their "net losses."

The Supreme Court of the United States has ruled that interest paid and accrued on borrowed capital is a loss reimbursable, and in so ruling cited the case of the State of New York v. The United States (160 U. S. 598, 621–624) as controlling. The act under which New York State recovered in that case provided for the refund of "costs, charges, and expenses" incurred in equipping troops, and so forth, which words were interpreted by the Congress by an amendment to that act as meaning costs, charges, and expenses "as well after as before" the passage of the previous act.

If interest paid by the State on its bonds for many years after the passage of that act was provided to be refunded by the amendment passed by Congress "as well after as before" the passage of the previous act, that case was exactly parallel with the provisions of pending S. 1432, providing for refund of interest paid after the passage of the act of March 2, 1919.

Mr. Elliott seeks to draw distinction between the precedents referred to in the House committee report and the claimants seeking recovery under S. 1432. He says the States (making no reference to municipalities, counties, or individuals, provided for in some of these former acts of Congress) were not engaged in business enterprises from which profits were to be expected, and so forth. Perhaps that is true, but on the other hand, their very existence was jeopardized by the then existing emergencies. Many claimants under the War Minerals Relief Act, when requested to produce the needed minerals while the original war mineral bill was pending in Congress, specifically pointed out to authorized Government agencies that the hazardous investments requested could not be safely considered as profit making and responded solely as a patriotic duty upon assurance of the then officials of the Government that they would be protected against loss. Their willingness that any profits made should be credited to the Government, as provided by the act of March 2, 1919, proves this assertion.

Congress has heretofore recognized by the act and its several amendments that this obligation, whether a legal liability or whether "a gratuity based upon moral and equitable consideration" should be discharged by the payment of net losses.

The expression, just above quoted, of Mr. Chief Justice Taft in his opinion in the case of Work v. United States ex relator Reeves, March 2, 1925 (267 U. S. 175) was pure "dicta." The question was not before the Court, and even if it was, it was only dicta, because in that case the Court ruled that no court, not even itself, had any jurisdiction. It was evidently so considered when the several cases later came before it under the authority of the act of February 13, 1929, which conferred jurisdiction on the courts, in that no mention was made in any of these several decisions in claimants' favor as to a gratuity, notwithstanding the fact that counsel for the Government forcefully presented that particular question in both brief and argument.

Mr. Elliott has fallen into the same error as the Solicitors of the Department of the Interior from the date of the approval of the act of March 2, 1919, until they were reversed by the Supreme Court on all questions of law in 1932 and 1933. This error was, among other errors, that they considered losses due to interest paid as interest and not as a "net loss."

The fact that the Government does not pay interest except for bond indebtedness and refund of taxes and the like is entirely irrelevant and immaterial. Section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919, and amendments thereto, and the affirmative Supreme Court decisions given under the authority of the act of 1929 all provide for the payment of "net losses." Neither the Congress nor the courts have been concerned with any of the particular items forming part of the net losses until the Supreme Court fixed a cut-off date, so to speak, beyond which date it interpreted the statute as not permitting the Secretary to refund losses due to interest paid and accrued.

Mr. Elliott says that "interest after March 2, 1919, on moneys which have been borrowed by claimants and expended in production of war minerals is not to be distinguished from interest negative by both the Comptroller of the Treasury and the Committee on Claims of the House, and that claims for interest after March 2, by reason of the delay of the Secretary in making settlement allowing interest to said date, is not to be distinguished from interest on any other claim against the United States where settlement is delayed."

Claimants are not asking for interest on their claims. They are asking solely for payment of their net losses suffered by reason of obligations incurred to pay interest on borrowed capital which Congress evidently intended as has been confirmed by the Supreme Court in its interpretation of the act. If the wording of section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919, was insufficient to include in the payment of net losses interest which has been paid or has accrued after that date on obligations incurred within the statutory period, it is certainly not inconsistent to ask the Congress to clarify or amend the wording of that act exactly as it did when it amended the act of 1861 to include costs, charges, and expenses as well after as before the passage of that act.

It is pertinent to call attention to the fact that many of the recoveries through the courts and by authority of Congress as expressed in the references cited in the committee report were recovered only after the Comptroller of the Treasury or other fiscal authorities of the Government had denied claims of States, municipalities, counties, corporations, partnerships, and individuals, and that such acts of Congress or decisions of the court under authority conferred by the Congress have reversed these adverse rulings of the Comptroller and other fiscal authorities. It is therefore only natural that the present Acting Comptroller General, Mr. Elliott, should adhere to these former rulings and advise against passage of the pending bill.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, frankly, I believe in being reasonably liberal with war claims, and I do so from the broad premise that the only way we can develop any kind of consciousness for peace in this country is to hit the Nation in the pocketbook. We can get into war so easily, but we will not pay the piper after we get into it. We develop some policy of war and then refuse to foot the bills, and take a rather niggardly and illiberal policy of paying the bills afterward. So I believe in liberality in connection with war claims, because it may ultimately serve to frighten us into a proper regard for the horrors of war.

I favor the payment of the claims which are set forth in the instant act. First of all, I do not believe any reason has been given why they should not be paid. They say to us, "We will sweep away 113 years of precedent." Is there anybody here who has the temerity to let any kind of rigid, inflexible precedent stand in the way of justice? They say, "You are going to sweep away 113 years of policy." I do not know what the policy has been before I came to the Congress, but certainly I will not let any policy stand in the way of considerations of justice. I believe the considerations of justice are involved in every one of these claims.

When Woodrow Wilson first brought his war message to the Congress and then spoke to the country in 1917, he said, "It is not an army that we must train; it is a Nation that we must prepare." In pursuit of that preparation, I suppose the administrative officers, like Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, went forth and exercised an implied, inferential kind of authority in pointing our every energy and resource toward victory for this country in the World War. If that is the case, then we ought to stand by those administrative edicts whereby innocent citizens, dealing at arm's length and in good faith with their Government, undertook to contract to supply war materials, and then that war suddenly came to a premature end, after they had incurred a heavy obligation and failed to realize thereon. That seems to be all that is involved in the instant bill. The idea of the Federal Government saying to one of its citizens, "In good faith we will keep you whole if you will exercise the patriotic function and duty of purveying necessary war material for the prosecution of the war to victory", and then to back down on that contract that was written in terms of good faith, looks to me like a niggardly and illiberal policy on the part of the Federal Government.

I sincerely hope that every Member of this House can find it in his heart to approve these claims and once more get them off the record.

With respect to the question raised by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] as to whether we shall distinguish these claims from others, I do not care whether we do or not. So long as the claims are founded in justice, it does not make any difference from what source they arise; they constitute a legal and moral obligation that devolves upon the Government of the United States; and even this Congress or any other Congress ought not let a hollow precedent or a kind of sham policy or any other consideration stand in the way of discharging our responsibility to give justice to those who dealt in good faith with their Government.

I hope the bill is passed. [Applause.]

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that anyone who comes out these days and says a word for economy is not popular. I appreciate that anyone who comes here and tells the truth about these bills that are brought in here to take money out of the Treasury of the United States is unpopular. But, frankly, I expect to be unpopular as a result of my position on this bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I decline to yield until I have gone far enough to demonstrate the complete fallacy of the arguments that have been brought out here.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman has made a pretty broad statement. I think he ought to yield on that.

Mr. TABER. I stand on that statement.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman point out who told an untruth and what they told?

Mr. TABER. I am going to tell the truth about the bill. I have not accused anyone of telling anything else. I am going to tell the truth about it. This is the fifth trip to the well. Time after time this law has been changed. Let me give you some illustration of the situation in the hearing before the Appropriations Subcommittee considering the deficiency bill in 1934 some of these claimants appeared. The Oneida Mines Co. made an original claim of $421,000. By awards they have already been paid $388,000, and that is all the award they have been granted. The Mineral Ridge Manganese Corporation made a claim for $134,499. They were declined an award at first, but later were given $21,000 under the 1929 amendment. The Hanna Minerals Co. made a claim for $319,000 and have already been paid $314,000. The White Marsh Mining Co. made an original claim of $325,000 and have already been paid $275,000 as an award.

The Secretary of the Interior was given the power to decide these claims and award damages. He has made these awards in almost every case. The particular company which has received at this time most consideration, the Chestatee Co., has been paid a total of $692,000 down to 1922. It was said they had borrowed $600,000 and were still in debt after that $692,000 was paid. They have subsequently been paid $136,000, yet still they have a claim above the awards that have been made and paid to them of $600,000. How does it get that way?

I think it is about time, without any intelligent explanation of any one of these claims or any showing of a legal right to ask the Government to pay them another dollar, when this House voted a year ago to turn down a rule for this purpose by a vote of 196 to 131, that the House should not go further, but should defeat this proposition.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I am for this bill, because it will discharge a just obligation, in my opinion, of the United States Government to these war-mineral claimants. Many of the individuals and companies that went into the war-minerals business for the production of manganese, chrome, and other war minerals went in at the direct solicitation of the Secretary of the Interior, or his duly authorized agents. It may be alleged that many of these companies made a profit on their operations. This statement is not entirely the fact, because they were continuously urged by the Interior Department to expand their operations, and most of them reinvested such profits as might have been made to comply with the wish of the Interior Department in order to supply additional war minerals.

It would appear to me as a member of the Committee on Mines and Mining that the sole issue before this House is the question of interest as constituting a part of net losses. The Supreme Court of the United States in 1933 wrote that such interest in these cases was part of the net loss. I sincerely hope this House will do justice to these long-suffering claimants and pass this legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] says these claimants have been to the well five times. He says they came to Congress every time asking for the passage of amendatory legislation. Here is volume 267 of the United States Supreme Court Reports. Surely the gentleman will believe the Supreme Court of the United States. With reference to the amendment of 1921, this opinion of the Court says, on page 180:

> This amendment was brought about on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior because he had felt obliged, under section 5 as it was, to reject some 600 claims for failure within the time limit to show a direct personal request or demand upon the claimant by the Government authorities named in the act and a response thereto by claimant and because the Comptroller had refused to pay any changed award of the Secretary made after a rehearing or to correct miscalculation.

That refers to miscalculations made by the Secretary. He asked for the amendment to the act. So the gentleman did not state the facts in that respect.

Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the Members of the Committee to the report put out by the Mines and Mining Committee, which was a unanimous report, at this session of Congress. This report is available to the Members and shows by numerous precedents that the interest we are talking about in this bill is not interest on a claim and neither is it a precedent. We have passed many acts and they are listed in this report. The most famous of them is the act reimbursing the State of Nevada for money which it expended in guarding the Overland Trail during the War between the States, and in addition to the principal which we reimbursed that State for, the Congress paid them interest at the rate of 24 percent per annum and in lesser amounts as the interest rate they paid was reduced.

In addition to that we have the famous case from the State of New York, the State from which the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] comes. In that case the Congress repaid the State of New York for money borrowed and expended in raising troops to fight the War between the States, and in addition paid them all the interest which that State had incurred in connection with that obligation before the debt was incurred as well as afterward. That is all we are asking for in this case.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. There is a contractual relationship involved to some extent as between the Government and these claimants which wholly and entirely distinguish these claims from those which the gentleman from Missouri has been speaking about.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is true.

Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand Report No. 558 of the Sixty-fifth Congress, made by Mr. Henderson, of the Mines and Mining Committee, to accompany H. R. 11259, introduced in that Congress, which contains a letter from Franklin K. Lane urging the passage of this original legislation, and stating in there that it was necessary, he thought, in order to carry on the war. I will not try to read it all at this time.

I also hold in my hand a report by Mr. Foster, of the Mines and Mining Committee, which I will be glad to show to any Member of the Committee. This is Report No. 493, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, in which appears quotations from the testimony of Mr. Lane. I want to quote just briefly one sentence. In referring to the original legislation and his request that it be enacted for the stimulation of production of these minerals which could be secured that way, he referred to the Chestatee case and the fact that five mines had been developed by these parties.

Mr. Lane says:

> This kind of thing can be done throughout the United States—

Now, particularly I want the Members to listen to the following quotation, and this is Franklin K. Lane talking:

> provided you can give some kind of guaranty that the man who develops these new properties, which are in competition with materials which come from abroad, where there are larger deposits, provided that the man who develops the small deposit in the United States can be assured he will get his money out of the investment that he puts into the development of these mines.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Since the gentleman has touched upon the subject of the correspondence of Franklin K. Lane, is it not a fact if that sterling character, whose untimely death occurred a few years ago, was alive today, these claims would be settled? In other words, he would have petitioned the Congress to take care of this matter and we would not have an interest charge of any kind?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I think the gentleman is correct.

In addition to the testimony of Mr. Lane, there is quoted the testimony of Mr. Barney Baruch, of the War Minerals Board, advocating this legislation. I also call the attention of the Members to the fact that in this report there is a quotation also from the testimony of Mr. Herbert Hoover, who at that time was connected with war affairs. He states:

> I feel there is very badly needed a stimulation to production, especially of the minerals which are mentioned.

He also states this:

> Viewed entirely from the point of view of ship construction, the expenditure in the securing of stimulation to production of these minerals would repay itself a hundredfold.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. I want to say at this point that I know of no one in the House who is more careful of his facts or fairer or more honest or more straightforward than the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK], and I am pleased that he has made that statement.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I thank the gentleman from Minnesota.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I have studied every word of the hearings and the reports of the committees and the entire history of this legislation from 1918 down to date. I give it to you as my conscientious judgment and my honest opinion that there never was a more meritorious bill before this Congress. Unless this bill is passed these 91 claimants who acted in response to the request of a Cabinet member in the time of our emergency, who acted out of a spirit of patriotism and put their money into these enterprises so that ships might be released for carrying war supplies and troops to France, so that we might have these necessary minerals to carry on the war, will not be made whole. They were just as much in the service of our country as the boys who wore the uniform, although, of course, they did not take the same risks. I think they are entitled to the same justice and equity that the Congress has given to those boys, and I hope every Member of this House will vote for the bill and at last do justice to these people who at the request and solicitation of Secretary Lane and in response to the urgings of Mr. Hoover and Mr. Baruch and other officials of the Government went out and invested their money in a business which they did not have any intention of going into except as a matter of patriotism and who now have lost this money and cannot be made whole unless this legislation is passed. [Applause.] I thank you.

Mr. Chairman, those Members of the House who will take time to investigate the facts relative to S. 1432, will, of course, realize the merit to that measure. One objection that has been raised against this measure is the fact that the war ended November 11, 1918, and, as one Member put it, "Why all this delay in connection with these obligations?" That is a fair question. It can be answered rather briefly and, in my opinion, entirely satisfactorily. When the war ended, November 11, 1918, the Secretary of the Interior, Franklin K. Lane, came to Congress and requested legislation to enable him to comply with promises he had made to these claimants that they would be protected against loss. This relief legislation was enacted as section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919.

Engineers, geologists, and auditors were appointed by the Secretary to investigate the mining activities and the various claims throughout the United States. These investigations continued for several years after the claims were filed with the Secretary, and, as a result of these investigations, hearings were held. This took more time. Many items of loss on the claims filed were disallowed by the Secretary. Rehearings were had, however, and many of these were afterwards allowed and paid in part. This was in 1921.

Litigation took place in connection with many items which the Secretary had disallowed, and in 1925 the Supreme Court of the United States held that no court has jurisdiction to question a decision of the Secretary of Interior; that his decision, even though erroneous, was final and conclusive. The claimants then sought to amend the War Minerals Act, so that disputed items could be considered. These items had to do with purchase of property and interest on borrowed capital, and other items. Finally, in 1929, Congress conferred jurisdiction on the courts to decide the disputed question of law. In 1932 the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the contentions of the claimants and ordered the disputed items of loss to be included in the adjustments and payments. As a result of all this it was not until 1933 and 1934 that claimants received certain payments which the court decreed they should have received in 1919.

During the years interest-bearing obligations had continued to run, because the claimants were unable to pay the same, and the present legislation is to reimburse claimants for the interest that they had paid during these years.

Consequently, anyone familiar with Government procedure, after checking over the above Supreme Court decisions, will readily understand that the claimants have been diligent, and that they have not been responsible for the long delay in the adjustment of these claims.

According to the Secretary of the Interior, this legislation is final and, if enacted, will complete the final chapter in the history of the war minerals legislation. The act expressly provides that payments made now shall be in full settlement of all claims.

In connection with the pending legislation, the suggestion has been made that claimants have already been paid enough to discharge any obligations which the Government owed them, and what they now want is interest on their claims.

I want to call this to the attention of the Members of the House, because the statement is absolutely erroneous. One claimant discussed this matter with me the other day, and I give you the facts just as he related them to me.

At the request of the Secretary of the Interior he incurred obligations in the sum of $97,000. When the war ended he was ruined financially. Congress created the War Minerals Commission. After the Government determined his claim was valid the Commission offered him a $2,000 settlement. He refused to accept it, and 3 weeks later was tendered a settlement of $22,022, which was accepted as part payment on account by the claimant. This was in 1919.

In 1923 the claim was reopened by the Commission, and items of loss which had been previously disallowed in 1919 were considered and paid in the sum of $39,000. After a lapse of years, while discussions as to items of loss and interpretation of the act were taking place, in 1934 the Commission reviewed the claim and allowed additional items that had heretofore been disallowed, and made settlement to the claimant on such items as loss of property and interest on obligations incurred to March 2, 1919, in the sum of $25,500. These partial payments, consisting of three, made to claimant at no time were sufficient to discharge the claimant's interest-bearing obligations, and interest had been paid by the claimant during these 17 years while the Commission had been reviewing claims under the act. The original principal claim has never yet been fully paid by the Commission to the claimant, not even taking into consideration the large sum of interest which has accumulated over this period of 17 years.

When these different awards were made this particular claimant paid them to his creditors, who applied the payments first to accumulated interest, and second to part payment on the principal indebtedness. This claimant never received any compensation from the Government for his work; and during all of this time has had to face these obligations, and is still in the same financial condition that he faced when the war ended. He was ruined financially then and is in that condition today. In addition, he has had to mortgage his property in order to avoid bankruptcy.

I am sure that the Members of the House want to get the facts correctly about this war minerals legislation, S. 1432. The other day I was talking to one of the Members and he voiced the objection that Congress never allowed interest on claims. His remark was absolutely correct, but has no application to the pending legislation. The war minerals claimants never made a profit or received any compensation whatever for their mining operations. Further, they are not asking for any interest at all on any "claims." This measure is entirely different from that type of legislation.

These claimants borrowed money and have had to pay interest to their creditors. This bill is to reimburse them for the losses they suffered by reason of obligations of that character. This bill is in no sense a bill to pay interest on a claim against the Government—and I say this by way of repetition—but is a bill to reimburse claimants who have obligated themselves to creditors at the express request of this Government. I am calling this to the attention of the Members of the House because I know they will want the facts and because a great many Members may have the wrong impression of this measure.

This matter is discussed at some length in the report of the Committee on Mines and Mining, No. 2002, which accompanies S. 1432.

The item of interest on borrowed money appears in 91 of the three-hundred-and-forty-odd petitions filed under the act of 1929 in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

[Excerpts from official findings of fact in the Chestatee case (claim no. 1)]

WASHINGTON, May 21, 1917.

MR. FULLER CALLAWAY,
La Grange, Ga.

DEAR MR. CALLAWAY: I am informed by the Bureau of Mines that there is a large body of pyrite ore owned by the Chestatee Pyrite & Chemical Corporation, 9 miles north of Dahlonega, Ga., Mr. N. T. Pratt, of Atlanta, president. I am informed that this property is being opened up to produce 50,000 tons of pyrite a year and will probably be in operation by September if all goes well. I am also informed that by extra effort the plant may be speeded up so as to obtain from 150,000 to 200,000 tons a year from this property.

As you know, sulphuric acid is absolutely essential for munitions and for the production of fertilizer, and they are especially needed in the present emergency. You have asked me where you could fit into some special work for the country. There is no emergency more pressing than the need of pyrite for our sulphuric-acid factories. Knowing your great powers of organization and your wide influence in north Georgia, I am writing to ask if you cannot in some way speed up this work.

It is a matter of such great importance that I shall be glad to render any assistance in my power in obtaining the necessary material and transportation facilities required, also furnish you with such expert advice concerning this property as you may desire.

Cordially yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

The reply of Mr. George L. Pratt to the foregoing letter is as follows:

JUNE 18, 1917.

Memorandum for Mr. Fuller E. Callaway.

Proposed Government aid: The owners are prepared to have available at the mines a minimum of 150 tons per day of lump ores, delivery to begin in August, and an equivalent amount of fines as soon thereafter as concentration mill can be erected. It is altogether probable that if additional labor can be made available that other entries can be made into the vein at other points to result in increased output perhaps to double these amounts.

If, however, this tonnage is to be made available for market to supply present urgent requirements, it will be necessary to secure Government aid or aid from other sources to the following extent:

Fourth. Send such experts from the Geological Survey or Bureau of Mines or such other departments as may be deemed best to determine from personal investigation and inspection that the property and vein and the quality of ores are sufficient to warrant exploitation on large scale, and if found to be advisable, render such aid as may then seem warranted.

Fifth. Underwrite in some way the hazard of mining risk which now seems warranted on account of the urgent necessity of heavy tonnage of ore, but which would not seem to be justified under sound conservative business principles in normal times.

In appearing before the committee in advocating the passage of this bill—and I refer to the hearing before the Committee on Mines and Mining—Secretary Lane, sponsoring the legislation in accordance with his promise to Ashcraft and Wilkinson, referred to his activities, and referred particularly to the activities of his agent, Mr. Callaway, and without throwing any bouquets he held the Chestatee Corporation up as an example of what could be done in other mines in the country.

As I say, Secretary Lane, sponsoring this legislation that I have referred to, and referring to the activities of Mr. Callaway, his agent, said, among other things—and I am quoting now from House Report No. 493, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, page 2:

Callaway is a very live man * * * that man has developed five mines since the middle of last year. * * * The men who owned these properties were not familiar with matters of large finance, did not know how to go about getting out their products and getting the money. * * * So he gave these men guidance and support, with the result that there has been that development which is very promising.

He went on to say:

That is the kind of thing that can be done throughout the United States, provided you can give some kind of guaranty that the man who develops these properties * * * can be assured that he will get his money out of the investment that he puts into the development of these mines.

Engineer Julihn, reporting to the Bureau of Mines, Department of the Interior, by letter from the Chestatee mine, dated November 28, 1917, said:

Arriving here as the first point of my itinerary, I quickly realized that the possibilities of this mine must be much greater than those of any other I would visit, and that no estimation of it could be made in cursory fashion. It is an enterprise of enormous potentialities in a formative state being attacked vigorously by capable men with adequate capital.

Again, on December 6, 1917, in reporting to the Bureau, Mr. Julihn said—and he was the authorized representative of the Government on the ground, cooperating and advising how to proceed:

the executive personnel is all that could be desired. There is no lack of money as the enterprise is adequately financed on a fine, clean basis.

The Secretary of the Interior, in making a partial award, said the following:

In this particular case * * * the then Secretary of the Interior personally requested one of the claimants to operate the properties on a big scale, which claimant at first declined to do unless the Government should underwrite the venture. This, of course, was impossible, but after some delay the Secretary, through his personal agent, requested Ashcraft and Wilkinson to use their influence to induce the claimant to enlarge his operations, and further, he asked them to assist in financing him.

Ashcraft and Wilkinson did so use their influence, and with success, and did finance claimant, for which financing claimant is obligated for a large amount.

The amount of money required to meet the Government's demands was so great as to make the securing of it by ordinary means almost impossible.

The activities of the Government to induce Ashcraft and Wilkinson to finance claimant so that war needs might be met quickly and in large measure were personal, direct, and effective. The fact that Secretary Lane, who himself had a part not only in the stimulation of the claimant, but, through suggestion, in the financing, recognized that Ashcraft and Wilkinson had performed a service to the Government is evidence of that service.

In reviewing this claim I have been struck by the magnitude of the expenditures and the possibilities of output. The very bigness of it tended to lead an examiner unconsciously to fail to give the claimant full justice. The record shows that the then Secretary of the Interior, realizing no doubt that this property presented opportunities for the biggest production of pyrites in the entire country, used every means in his power to persuade the claimant to develop it. His full influence short of underwriting the project, was exerted. Always, too, there was the realization that the claimant, in responding to the Government's request, would suffer great financial loss, notwithstanding the generous provisions of the War Minerals Relief Act.

THE SUPREME COURT, IN DECIDING THAT INTEREST ON BORROWED MONEY FOR WARTIME MINING ADVENTURES SHOULD RUN TO MARCH 2, 1919, ONLY, READ INTO THE STATUTE LANGUAGE WHICH CAUSED DENIAL TO CLAIMANTS OF THEIR NET LOSS ON THIS ITEM

It is clear that the Supreme Court, in the decision in Ickes v. Chestatee (289 U. S. 510) substituted the word "accrued" for the word "incurred" in the relevant proviso of the Relief Act, namely:

That no claims shall be paid unless it shall appear to the satisfaction of said Secretary that moneys were invested or obligations were incurred subsequent to April 6, 1917, and prior to November 12, 1918—

And so forth. This mistake evidently arose through the Supreme Court, in the Ickes decision, overlooking the pertinent language of the statute above quoted, which had been referred to in the earlier decision on this question, namely, Wilbur v. Chestatee (284 U. S. 231).

In the Wilbur decision the Court said:

The amount of interest that at the time of the passage of the Relief Act, March 2, 1919, had been paid or incurred by relator for money borrowed and lost in producing and preparing to produce pyrites upon the specified conditions is to be taken into account in determining the amount of its net loss as of that date. It constitutes a part of relator's expenditures and cost of the undertaking, and so is within the terms of the section as amended (United States v. New York, 160 U. S. 598; 40 L. ed. 551, 558–560; 16 S. Ct. 402).

The language "paid or incurred" obviously follows the language of the statute above noted. This opinion further states in speaking of the interest item:

It must be shown clearly that such interest was paid or the obligations incurred by relator at the instance of one of the specified governmental agencies.

The Secretary of the Interior, however, construed this Wilbur opinion to mean that he should only adjust and settle for interest paid or accrued up to the date of March 2, 1919, holding that the relief act, approved on that date, directed that he should "pay such net losses as have been suffered", and so forth, and that the direction of the enacting clause was not modified by any provisos in the statute. An analysis of the Secretary's construction shows that he gave first prominence to the adverbial clause "as have been suffered" in a sentence that directed him to pay net losses. He lost sight of the objective in the sentence; that is, to "pay net losses."

Upon the case going to the Supreme Court, the Secretary's contention was upheld (reversing the court of appeals) in the decision Ickes v. Chestatee (289 U. S. 518), and it is here that the Court erred by reading into the statute a meaning not expressed by its plain language.

The Court in the opinion Ickes v. Chestatee (289 U. S. 510) on this point said:

When this Court stated in the Wilbur case that in determining the loss as of March 2, 1919, there shall be taken into account the amount of interest which has been paid or incurred by relator for money borrowed and lost.

The word "incurred" was used to mean interest accrued on that date.

By this rule the Court has clearly stated that the word "incurred" that appears in the relief act and in its opinion in the Wilbur case should mean "accrued." The language of the statute is clear. There is no ambiguity. The statute clearly states that net loss should be paid and provides that no claim shall be paid unless "* * * moneys were invested or obligations were incurred * * *" prior to November 12, 1918. There is no limitation in the statute to suggest that interest upon moneys borrowed for the wartime adventure ending November 11, 1918, should carry interest only until the date of the passage of the act, namely, March 2, 1919.

By the oversight of the Supreme Court in the foregoing quotation from the Ickes opinion it is clear that the Court "legislated" and read new language into the War Minerals Relief Act.

The Supreme Court, in its decision that interest on borrowed money for wartime operations under the Relief Act should run only until March 2, 1919, adopted a mistaken view of accounting practice and erroneously decided that the wartime operations of claimants were "going businesses."

In the decision Ickes v. Chestatee (289 U. S. 510), the Court, while holding that "net loss" had to be paid to March 2, 1919, undertook to define "net loss" in the following language:

The method of determining the net losses in such businesses during a particular period, or in a particular adventure, is well settled. The net losses consist of any deficit from operations plus any shrinkage in value of the plant investment. In calculating the loss for a period it is immaterial whether items entered as operating expense or as investment have been paid or are still owed for. If the capital employed by the corporation during the period, whether owned or borrowed, was sunk, its loss will necessarily be reflected either in the deficit from operations or in the shrinkage in value of the capital assets.

This definition is a good one. The Court, however, continues as follows:

In calculating the operating deficit during the period ending March 2, 1919, interest paid or accrued on the borrowed capital was treated as an operating charge. Interest accruing thereafter on any loan then outstanding is comparable to the cost of caring, after that date, of the value of that property. Such items enter into the determination of the losses of a later period, and with these the Government has no concern. Hence the Secretary properly refused to consider interest accrued after March 2, 1919, in calculating losses during the period ending that day.

This second quotation from the opinion belies the first. The Court ignored the record in this case that showed clearly that the operation was not a going concern. It was a war-time undertaking. But the writer of the opinion undertook to classify all of the war minerals claims as operations or businesses as "continuing" and not those that operated for a specific period only. They were "particular adventures." This fact is well known. In fact, in an earlier opinion, Wilbur v. Vindicator (284 U. S. 231), the Court clearly recognized this fact, when speaking of the continuing value of these war-time operations in the following language:

No such assumption can be entertained, for it's everywhere known that the contrary is true and that the value of lands and plans purchased and constructed to produce war minerals * * * greatly and permanently declined when the struggle ended.

War-minerals operations were specific or particular mining ventures, the net loss on which, up to the date of the armistice, including obligations on that date of all kinds, is, by the act of March 2, 1919, to be reimbursed. There is no language or suggestion, i. e., the act, to the effect that part of the said obligations are to be disregarded if not paid by March 2, 1919, and others are to be allowed. Yet this absurdity results from the intrusion of the so-called cut-off date for interest-bearing obligations.

COMMENTS ON LETTER OF ACTING COMPTROLLER GENERAL R. N. ELLIOTT TO THE HONORABLE JOHN J. COCHRAN, DATED MARCH 13, 1936

Mr. Elliott's letter makes no reference to the original controlling war-minerals statute, approved October 5, 1918, the title of which is as follows:

The act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply.

The Supreme Court of the United States has ruled in effect, in one of the test cases (288 U. S. 97), that the act of October 5, 1918, is the controlling war minerals statute. In so ruling the Court used the following words:

Counsel for respondent (the claimant) correctly states the issue presented to the trial court. * * * Are the losses suffered for expenditures for the items involved here within the provisions of the act of October 5, 1918, as amended and supplemented by the act of October 2, 1919?

And:

With the issue as stated, the only showing required is that a claim for such losses was made and that such claim was disallowed because of the belief of the petitioner (the Secretary of the Interior) that the law did not permit such allowances. (Parentheses supplied.)

Section 5 of that act provided that the Government should pay "just compensation", and conferred upon claimant the right to sue for just compensation, if such were not offered, "in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code." Clearly, therefore, at the time of the passage of section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919, the Government was liable to producers who could prove their claims, and the wording of said section 5, wherein it provided in the enacting clause for the payment of "net losses", must be fairly considered as a congressional interpretation or measure of the "just compensation" provided for in the original act.

It is true that section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919, stated that nothing in that section "shall be construed to confer jurisdiction upon any court to entertain a suit against the United States"; but it did not remove the right that claimants enjoyed at that time to sue for "just compensation" under the preceding act of October 5, 1918; but claimants did not sue. They accepted in good faith the provisions made by the Congress when it passed section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919, that their "net losses" should be paid. They agreed to the provisions that in determining net losses ores and minerals and property owned by claimants might be charged against the awards. They also accepted the provision that the Government should take credit for any profits which had been earned by them. In other words, they compromised, so to speak, with the Government, waiving their right to "just compensation" and accepting in lieu thereof the right to prove and receive their "net losses."

The Supreme Court of the United States has ruled that interest paid and accrued on borrowed capital is a loss reimbursable, and in so ruling cited the case of the State of New York v. The United States (160 U. S. 598, 621–624) as controlling. The act under which New York State recovered in that case provided for the refund of "costs, charges, and expenses" incurred in equipping troops, and so forth, which words were interpreted by the Congress by an amendment to that act as meaning costs, charges, and expenses "as well after as before" the passage of the previous act.

If interest paid by the State on its bonds for many years after the passage of that act was provided to be refunded by the amendment passed by Congress "as well after as before" the passage of the previous act, that case was exactly parallel with the provisions of pending S. 1432 providing for refund of interest paid after the passage of the act of March 2, 1919.

Mr. Elliott seeks to draw distinction between the precedents referred to in the House committee report and the claimants seeking recovery under Senate bill 1432. He says the States—making no reference to municipalities, counties, or individuals, provided for in some of these former acts of Congress—were not engaged in business enterprises from which profits were to be expected, and so forth. Perhaps that is true, but on the other hand their very existence was jeopardized by the then existing emergencies. Many claimants under the War Minerals Relief Act, when requested to produce the needed minerals while the original war mineral bill was pending in Congress, specifically pointed out to authorized Government agencies that the hazardous investments requested could not be safely considered as profit making and responded solely as a patriotic duty upon assurances of the then officials of the Government that they would be protected against loss. Their willingness that any profits made should be credited to the Government, as provided by the act of March 2, 1919, proves this assertion.

Congress has heretofore recognized by the act and its several amendments that this obligation, whether a legal liability or whether "a gratuity based upon moral and equitable consideration", should be discharged by the payment of net losses.

The expression just above quoted of Mr. Chief Justice Taft in his opinion in the case of Work v. United States ex relator Reeves, March 2, 1925 (267 U. S. 175), was pure "dicta." The question was not before the Court, and even if it was it was only dicta because in that case the Court ruled that no court, not even itself, had any jurisdiction. It was evidently so considered when the several cases later came before it under the authority of the act of February 13, 1929, which conferred jurisdiction on the courts in that no mention was made in any of these several decisions in claimants' favor as to a gratuity, notwithstanding the fact that counsel for the Government forcefully presented that particular question in both brief and argument.

Mr. Elliott has fallen into the same error as the Solicitors of the Department of the Interior from the date of the approval of the act of March 2, 1919, until they were reversed by the Supreme Court on all questions of law in 1932 and 1933. This error was, among other errors, that they considered losses due to interest paid as interest and not as a "net loss."

The fact that the Government does not pay interest except for bond indebtedness and refund of taxes and the like is entirely irrelevant and immaterial. Section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919, and amendments thereto, and the affirmative Supreme Court decisions given under the authority of the act of 1929 all provide for the payment of "net losses." Neither the Congress nor the courts have been concerned with any of the particular items forming part of the net losses until the Supreme Court fixed a cut-off date, so to speak, beyond which date it interpreted the statute as not permitting the secretary to refund losses due to interest paid and accrued.

Mr. Elliott says that—

> Interest after March 2, 1919, on moneys which have been borrowed by claimants and expended in production of war minerals is not to be distinguished from interest negative by both the Comptroller of the Treasury and the Committee on Claims of the House, and that claims for interest after March 2, by reason of the delay of the Secretary in making settlement allowing interest to said date is not to be distinguished from interest on any other claim against the United States where settlement is delayed.

Claimants are not asking for interest on their claims. They are asking solely for payment of their net losses suffered by reason of obligations incurred to pay interest on borrowed capital, which Congress evidently intended, as has been confirmed by the Supreme Court in its interpretation of the act. If the wording of section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919, was insufficient to include in the payment of net losses interest which has been paid or has accrued after that date on obligations incurred within the statutory period, it is certainly not inconsistent to ask the Congress to clarify or amend the wording of that act exactly as it did when it amended the act of 1861 to include costs, charges, and expenses as well after as before the passage of that act.

It is pertinent to call attention to the fact that many of the recoveries through the courts and by authority of Congress as expressed in the references cited in the committee report were recovered only after the Comptroller of the Treasury or other fiscal authorities of the Government had denied claims of States, municipalities, counties, corporations, partnerships, and individuals, and that such acts of Congress or decisions of the court under authority conferred by the Congress have reversed these adverse rulings of the Comptroller and other fiscal authorities. It is, therefore, only natural that the present Acting Comptroller General, Mr. Elliott, should adhere to these former rulings and advise against passage of the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That in any claim that has heretofore been filed within the time and in the manner provided by the act approved March 2, 1919 (40 Stat. 1272), as amended, generally referred to as the "War Minerals Relief Statutes", in which the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia under the authority conferred upon said court by the act approved February 13, 1929 (45 Stat. 1166), has adjudged or decreed interest payments or obligations to be losses reimbursable within the meaning of the act of March 2, 1919 (40 Stat. 1272), as amended, the Secretary of the Interior shall open or reopen such claim and include in his adjustments and payments of losses, interest which has been paid or has accrued to the date of approval of this act: Provided, however, That such losses shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior as a matter of fact to be the result of a legal obligation incurred within the statutory period as provided in said act of March 2, 1919: And provided further, That the sum paid in satisfying said claims shall not exceed in total $1,250,000. It is also provided that all settlements under this act and pursuant to its provisions shall constitute full and complete discharge of all obligations of the United States accruing under the War Minerals Act and acts amendatory thereof.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I listened to this debate yesterday in all its phases, and I am convinced this is a meritorious bill.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] has eloquently explained the entire situation in reference to passage of similar previous bills in this connection and also to the decisions of the Supreme Court. It seems to me only a matter of justice that this House should pass the bill and take care of these people who, in time of war, and as a patriotic measure, went out and started these mines at the request of the Secretary of the Interior, and were promised, at that time, that no losses would come to them and that the United States Government would reimburse them if there were any losses suffered by them as a result of their patriotic endeavor to provide sufficient minerals and thereby release ships to convey troops with which, otherwise, we would have had to import these minerals into the United States in order to take care of our national defense.

The gentleman from Georgia explained thoroughly that the Supreme Court in its decision stated that the interest payments should be covered into the legal meaning of net losses.

Many of these people, as the gentleman has explained, are in want, as referred to in the Virginia case and the Georgia case. These cases cover 24 States of the Union. It is not a matter of something that the gentleman from Georgia is trying to pass for a constituent. It is a matter that affects 24 States of the Union, and the Supreme Court has said that the interest charges should be paid. The 1919 law was misconstrued by the courts, and then the Supreme Court of the United States said that interest charges were intended to be included and that these people should be reimbursed not only for the original cost which they understook at the instance of the Secretary of the Interior in time of war, but interest should be paid them for what they had lost. This seems only equity.

It is now a long time since the war, but what these people did was just as important at that time to the Nation as the troops that went to the front or as the men who were in the Artillery or Infantry or any other branch of the service. It was important to get these minerals to put into the shells that were to be fired upon the enemy and for many other purposes. It was important that these minerals be found.

The Secretary of the Interior caused investigation to be made, asked these people to open up new mines, asked them to exploit further mines which were opened, and told them, "If you have to borrow money to open these mines or get these minerals, we will see to it that you do not lose any money, and we will see to it that you are reimbursed for everything you put out." It is now a question of the good faith of the United States Government with its citizens who patriotically did their duty, opened the mines, did what they were asked to do, and at this time we certainly should not allow them to suffer for carrying out their patriotic duty to the Government, and I hope the bill will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I agree entirely with what has been so well said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY]. I hope and pray that this country will never engage in the situation we were in during the period of 1914, when we began the preparation for the war of 1918, but I trust if we are in such a crisis that those who are in authority and who may begin by calling upon the people to support the Government, that those upon whom they call will not have staring them in the face the fact that the Government of the United States was reckless and defaulting in its obligations as to just claims during the war through which we have just passed.

Interest losses mean to my mind a matter not only of law but plain common sense and justice as an obligation incurred.

I have just as much love for my Government of the United States as any man here who would oppose these claims, but I believe it is my duty as a Member of this body to exert what little influence I may have with this Government to have it meet its obligations. I shall vote for this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not desire to take the 5 minutes. I have opposed so many of these large expenditures that I think I shall vote for this war minerals bill. I have read the debate and been rather impressed thereby. Somehow after reading the reports of investigating committees and listening to speeches made against those in the war who made huge profits, I have not heard from the Democratic side of the House very much sympathy expressed for those people who actually lost money. Today we find you are really pleading for some of those corporations which did suffer losses.

I am inclined to back you up in an effort to do belated justice to these people, for whom you have not heretofore expressed much concern. All we have ever heard from you is something about these awful profits that these recently styled "entrenched greed" people made during the war. Others who suffered severe losses have not been mentioned. So I join with you, in spite of the precedent you may be establishing with relation to interest payments, welcoming your change of attitude on this War Minerals Act, and shall vote for the bill. [Applause.] But I do not want it understood that I have backed down a fraction of an inch from the verbal castigations that I have administered because of so many of your unwarranted and reckless expenditures.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words in order to secure recognition.

I regret to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] make the speech that he has just made. The principle involved here, the long-established policy of the Government, is too great for him to set aside, and I would rather see him continue the way that he has continued in the past. The gentleman and I have not always agreed on relief measures, but we generally agree on unsound claims bills.

As I said yesterday, the principle involved in this bill is whether or not you are going to pay interest to claimants beyond the date of the passage of the original act. The claimants received payment for losses as well as interest up to that date. This provides interest to date of settlement.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I only have a few minutes. I decline to yield. To hear some of the gentlemen talk here today, one would wonder whether or not these claimants have ever received any money. I made the statement on the floor yesterday and put into the RECORD a showing that they received approximately $10,000,000. Then, again, you have 84 additional cases still pending in court, and some day, if you pass this bill, you will pass another not only paying losses but interest to date of settlement, which will be for over 15 years, as well as the principal.

I am not going to vote for legislation that will set a precedent that is going to come back to plague us.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. PITTENGER] is very much interested in this bill, as is his colleague [Mr. MAAS], judging from their speeches, although there is no claimant from their State. I am wondering, if we pass this bill, whether we will have another Minnesota fire-claims bill here asking us to pay interest to date of settlement of those claims, which Congress paid twice.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order. The gentleman is not discussing the bill.

Mr. COCHRAN. Not the way the gentleman would like to have me discuss it. Is it not reasonable that such a bill will be introduced? It is a matter of wonder to me how some of the Minnesota Members who were so interested in the Minnesota fire-claims bill and the Russian shoe bill should be interested in this bill and also are interested in another bill that I suppose will come in later—the so-called grain corporations bill.

Mr. KVALE. Oh, the gentleman is too fair to impugn the motives of his colleagues, and I know that he will withdraw his statement.

Mr. COCHRAN. I shall not withdraw my statement. I might say "some of those", if that will satisfy the gentleman, but I am not going to withdraw the statement, in view of what happened on the floor of the House yesterday and today. I do not impugn the motives of the gentleman, as he is not leading the fight for this bill.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order; that has nothing to do with this.

Mr. COCHRAN. The grain bill is another raid on the Treasury. Remember what I say, it will be back at a later date.

I repeat, I urge the Members of this House to consider the policy that this Government and this Congress has followed since 1813 and vote down this legislation. Do not provide to pay interest on losses or claims up to date of settlement.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Inasmuch as the gentleman referred to me, I just wanted to say that I would like to go along with the gentleman, but how about the billion and a half dollars' raid on the Treasury for the W. P. A.?

Mr. COCHRAN. That is not a raid on the Treasury. That is to help people in distress, and I say to the gentleman that we will pass that bill. We do not want riots in this country. I would rather vote a billion and a half for people who cannot find employment and have no money to buy food than to vote for this bill. There is absolutely no connection between the two.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon the bill and all amendments thereto do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I demand recognition. I had a right to have recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Chair must recognize the chairman of the committee. Under the rule the Committee will rise.

The Committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BEAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill S. 1432, and, pursuant to House Resolution 487, he reported the bill back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER and Mr. COCHRAN) there were ayes 129 and noes 48.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and six Members are present, not a quorum.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 232, nays 97, not voting 98, as follows:

ADMINISTRATIVE POWERS OF THE COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 12447) to amend certain provisions of the banking laws relating to the administrative powers of the Comptroller of the Currency, the conversion of State banks into national banks, the payment of dividends on common stock of national banks, and the election and duties of shareholders' agents, and for other purposes, reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency, be recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

AMERICANISM VERSUS NEW DEALISM

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to correct my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech recently delivered by myself.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address, delivered by me before the Republican State convention, St. Louis, Mo., April 27, 1936:

Chairman Dalton, my fellow Republicans, and countrymen, indeed, I would be inhuman and ungrateful if I did not express to you my appreciation of the high honor which you have just conferred upon me by electing me temporary chairman of this State convention, to deliver this keynote address to such a large and enthusiastic gathering of representative Missouri Republicans. The militant spirit revealed by this vast throng is proof positive that the Republican Party is very much alive. It presages our return to power this November, which will mark the end of the most tyrannical, extravagant, and debauched administration in the history of our Republic.

Proud as I am to be a Republican, I want to speak to you today not so much as a member of a great political party, but as an American patriot who still loves his country and is willing to fight, and if need be, die for liberty. In this grave crisis and at this tragic hour, the American people should forget all about politics. The battle today is not between Democrats and Republicans; it is between those citizens of our country who still believe in our form of government, revere the Constitution, and prize their freedom more than they do benevolent doles, and another class of our citizenry who have become so entranced with and allured by New Deal promises or so intimidated by New Deal threats that they are willing to sell their souls for a mess of pottage. Today the conflict is between Americanism and New Dealism.

Franklin Delano Roosevelt was elected upon an excellent platform, written by prominent members of the Democratic Party. With one or two exceptions, he has consistently and completely broken every promise and plank in that platform, violated the pledges he made in his speeches as a candidate, and repudiated the cardinal principles and teachings of the great founder and patron saint of the Democratic Party. Likewise, he has turned his back upon the stalwart leaders of democracy and surrounded himself with a coterie of sophisticated satellites, impractical and inexperienced theorists, who were never elected to any office and were scarcely known to anyone, in order that he might carry out almost plank for plank and word for word the last platform of the Socialist Party. That is why practically every great Democratic leader of this country has already "taken a walk", and are as vehemently and conscientiously opposed to the dangerous doctrines, the insidious propaganda, and the charlatan methods of the New Dealers as we Republicans ourselves are.

In the past, Republicans and Democrats have differed on many matters, such as the tariff, League of Nations, and monetary policies, but never in the history of our Republic have Republicans and Democrats differed on the Constitution. And always, in a grave crisis when liberty is imperiled, when our rights and privileges as free men are endangered, and when the very fabric of our form of government is threatened with destruction, the American people know no politics, for they place patriotism above partisanship and the welfare of our country above personal greed and gain.

The task of criticism is by no means pleasant, but often is necessary. It is imperative that we have two great political parties in this country; and just as competition is necessary to have good business, so, in order to have clean and efficient government, it is necessary that we have a highly organized, aggressive, intelligent, and fearless minority, whose sacred right and solemn duty it is to criticize and hold in check the party which happens to be in power. For over a year the American people under this New Deal forgot their politics and the Republicans of this Nation, both in and out of Congress, cooperated almost to the point of folly with the present administration in its war on the depression. Not until the Houdini in the White House ran out of rabbits which he pulled out of his hat, not until the magician lost his magic wand, not until the laughing playboy turned his back upon the very men of his own party who were most responsible for his nomination and election, not until he ruthlessly trampled into oblivion the platform on which he was elected, not until he deliberately and flagrantly violated the promises he had made as a candidate, not until he had swallowed up the legislative functions of a supine, bootlicking, and intimidated Congress, not until he would have usurped the judicial functions of our courts and destroyed the Constitution, did the American people raise their voice in protest.

The amazing thing is that our people have been so patient, which can be explained only by the apathy and indifference of some and by the cowardice of others. Since I have spoken in practically all parts of our State and most of you present have no doubt heard me many times before, I do not care at this time to trespass upon your patience by reciting in detail the many broken promises of this administration.

After all, it is unnecessary to rehash old stuff, for the American people, even the small portion comprising the most ignorant, now fully realize that President Roosevelt and his "brain trusters" have enormously increased the cost of Government, piled bureau upon bureau, debased our currency, juggled finances, debauched the civil service, placed the Government in competition with all kinds of private enterprise, added more than 800,000 employees to the pay roll, multiplied our deficits, augmented our debt, and fed the American people expensive, poisonous propaganda while trying to ease their pain by feeding them palliatives the cost of which they must ultimately bear.

At first this administration based its hope of recovery and reform upon the N. R. A., which was a deliberate communistic attempt to regiment American industry and place business all over this country in a strait jacket. An overwhelmingly Democratic Congress immediately surrendered its prerogatives to the Executive, whose appointees as directors of various code authorities, drawing fat salaries, arrogantly and mercilessly cracked the whip over the heads of businessmen, large and small, until the Supreme Court declared the infamous, illogical, and un-American scheme of fascism unconstitutional and by a unanimous and vigorous opinion wrung the neck of the "blue buzzard" and threw its dead carcass out the window—not, however, until great wrongs had been perpetrated upon a free people and many of our citizens had been subjected to unjust and inexcusable assessments and forced to pay fines and suffer imprisonment. So incensed was the President after that adverse decision that he branded the nine mature Justices—who are not subject to political pressure, the violence of the mob, or Executive intimidation; men of intelligence and character, of high patriotism and long legal training and experience; who hold office for life and are free to render fair, just, and unbiased opinions; who are the repository of our rights and the safeguard of our liberties, the only citadel of freedom that stands between us and tyranny—as belonging to the "horse and buggy" age.

In other words, in the President's opinion the Court is obsolete and outworn and might as well be abolished. In spite of their decision he would resurrect the "blue buzzard" and several bills shortly afterward were introduced by Members of Congress in both Houses to set up a skeleton N. R. A. Thousands of N. R. A. employees were kept on the public pay roll for months after the act was nullified by the Court, at an enormous expense to the already overburdened American taxpayer. It is significant that a few months after the Court's decision, while the Ways and Means Committee of the House was considering the Guffey Coal Act, which should be called the "Goofy bill", since it establishes an N. R. A. for the bituminous-coal industry, the President wrote a letter over his own signature to Congressman SAM B. HILL, of the State of Washington, urging him and his colleagues not to allow any doubts, no matter how reasonable, as to the constitutionality of the measure they were considering, to deter them from enacting it into law. The essence of that letter was "ignore the Supreme Court, forget the oaths you have taken to uphold, protect, and defend the Constitution, and pass this bill because I want it." One of the pieces of "must" legislation. And the bill was passed, though I anticipate the Court will knock it in the head when they get to it.

Our experience with N. R. A., which was nothing more than a modern Spanish inquisition, with all of its brutal tyrannies, artificial codes, and unreasonable edicts issued by dictatorial bureaucrats, having the force of binding law upon the members of an industry, certainly taught us that it is impossible to ballyhoo or parade one's self back to prosperity, and also that the American people, unlike dumb cattle, refuse to be driven by these insolent little pygmies who never had any business of their own and who cared naught for the business of others so long as they received their fat salaries. A recent report by Acting Budget Director Daniel W. Bell to the Ways and Means Committee informs us that the N. R. A. cost the taxpayers of the United States $25,057,164, and that exactly $6,042,302 was expended after the Supreme Court declared the act unconstitutional. Bear in mind that this is only administrative expense, paid out directly by the Government, and does not take into account the hundreds of millions of dollars in losses and foolish expenses which business and industry of this country suffered.

In spite of this sad and costly experience, the administration is right now contemplating bringing in a new N. R. A. bill, and in case Mr. Roosevelt by any chance should be reelected this fall—and sufficient changes are made in the Supreme Court—and given another 4 years of Roosevelt, they will be made, by packing the Court or by the death of present members—American business will once more have saddled upon its back this blood-sucking serpent that will destroy its very life.

The next main prop to be knocked from under the New Deal was the A. A. A. Just as the N. R. A. had attempted to regulate and dictate to businessmen and industry, so the A. A. A. attempted to regiment the American farmer. Over $1,000,000,000 were handed out to the producers of certain products for not raising those products. Bear in mind that these Government checks went to fewer than half the farmers of this country, because many farmers refused to cooperate in such a scheme, which they believed to be un-American, and could not remain permanent, and which the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional, while other farmers produced certain commodities which did not fall under the program of A. A. A. The dairy industry, which is the greatest branch of agriculture, the biggest single industry in this country—bigger than oil, bigger than steel, bigger than automobile—suffered terribly under the A. A. A. and never received any benefits therefrom. Likewise the poultry raisers and fruit growers, as well as the dairy farmers in my own congressional district down in the Ozarks, never participated in any of these benefits. The fact of the matter is that certain classes of farmers were penalized in order to assist other kinds of farmers, and some sections of the country benefited at the expense of others.

And don't forget how the payments varied. According to the report of the Secretary of Agriculture himself, which, of course, had to be wormed out of him, one Florida sugar corporation, under the A. A. A., had received a total of $1,067,665 in three checks; a Hawaiian sugar company received a single check for $470,318 and in all will receive $1,022,047.87; a sugar grower in Puerto Rico was paid $961,065; one California farmer received over $200,000 for not raising 14,000 hogs; one cotton plantation was paid not far from $200,000 for holding down cotton production—but one-quarter of the cotton producers received less than $100. Many rich absentee landlords profited enormously under the A. A. A., whereas the poor, struggling tenant farmer and sharecropper suffered terribly. By limiting the acreage and reducing production they were thrown out of employment and placed upon the relief rolls, while at the same time the cost of overalls, work shirts, and calico dresses practically doubled for the farmers, miners, and manual laborers of our country. Likewise the processing tax on cotton largely paralyzed the great textile industry in New England, Pennsylvania, and the Carolinas. Many of the workers in these mills have been thrown out of employment because of the tremendous increase in imports of cotton and cotton fabrics from other parts of the world, principally Japan. The process tax on cotton also destroyed our world cotton export market. Today European nations, instead of buying raw cotton from the United States, are importing it from Brazil, Egypt, the Sudan, Caucasia, and India.

Under the A. A. A. a single wheat grower had payments running up to nearly $100,000, and some of the land on which he was paid for growing no wheat he had leased from the Indians for 50 cents an acre. It is a known fact that in many instances farmers have received more in 1 year for not planting crops on their lands than the land itself was actually worth.

In the meantime what happened to the millions of consumers of this country? Ask any housewife and she will tell you of the tremendous increase in the cost of living. Processing tax on corn and hogs made pork a luxury and the poor could eat no meat. The "brain trusters" preach the "abundant life", and in order to bring about its fulfillment they advocate a philosophy of scarcity, which has produced misery. In order to clothe the naked, they plow under the cotton; in order to feed the hungry, they burn wheat, agree not to plant corn if they are paid for their effortless task, and knock little pigs in the head.

When the farmer was paid not to grow cotton, he grew peanuts; when he was paid not to plant peanuts, he grew tobacco; when he was paid not to plant tobacco, he planted potatoes; then they proposed to pay him not to plant potatoes. The idiocy of these unnatural, artificial attempts to regulate nature, which is as foolish and futile as the attempt to legislate against cyclones or to repeal the law of gravity, culminated in the famous and never-to-be-forgotten potato-control law. On the 3d of last January President Roosevelt emphatically and almost defiantly challenged the Members of Congress to repeal any of the New Deal legislation. He was aware of his overwhelming majority in both Houses, but had forgotten the Supreme Court. With ferocity in his eyes and bitterness in his voice, he gave us to understand that the New Deal "would not retreat but would advance." Yet, 1 month later, the New Deal had retracted and the President had to swallow his own Adam's apple when he sent a special message to the House asking the Members of Congress to repeal the Cotton, Potato, and Tobacco Control Acts, which his administration had previously urged the very same Members to enact into law.

Notwithstanding this sad and costly experiment, the present administration is determined to resurrect the A. A. A. Already two bills have passed this session of Congress since the invalidation of the A. A. A. by the Supreme Court which will in some degree carry out the purposes of the original act—one is the Soil Conservation Act, which is a masquerade, and is, in reality, a crop-control act, and the other is the tobacco-control bill. Both of these acts are bad and vicious legislation, enacted over my vigorous protest, for they turn over to Czar Wallace complete authority to regulate in his omnipotent, infallible, impeccable, and flawless wisdom not only the growing of tobacco but will establish a dangerous precedent leading to the control of every crop in every section of this country, setting class against class and section against section. Both acts, in my opinion, are a subtle mixture of subterfuge and sophistry and a deliberate and insidious attempt to circumvent the adverse decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on the old A. A. A. law.

Any farmer who thinks he desires the resurrection of the A. A. A. should study carefully the comparative figures on imports and exports for 1934 and 1935 on a number of the foremost agricultural products, as follows:

		Imports		Exports
		1934	1935	1934	1935
Fresh beef	pounds	140,474	8,584,114	10,411,017	10,499,421
Fresh pork	do	127,746	3,922,609	36,757,287	10,208,198
Wheat	bushels	7,736,532	27,438,870	19,968,589	232,965
Wheat flour	pounds	203,235	2,611,069	[1] 4,163,325	[1] 1,003,132
Corn	bushels	2,959,256	43,242,296	2,987,419	177,382

[1] Barrels.

And be it always remembered that before the farmer receives his check or any benefit he must first surrender his liberty and submit to the arbitrary control of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Many people believe that President Roosevelt will be reelected, partially because of his winsome smile, his mellifluous voice and entrancing personality, because his sweet phrases and honeyed words have captured many silly sentimentalists; but more particularly because of the expenditure of enormous funds which Congress, much to its shame and lasting disgrace, wrongfully turned over to him. In the Seventy-third Congress the President was given $3,300,000,000, while at the first session of this Congress, because of pressure from the White House and other sources, he was voted $4,880,000,000, ostensibly for relief, but in reality to use as a slush fund. I was honored by my Republican colleagues over a year ago by being chosen in caucus to lead the fight on the floor of the House against this huge sum of money being turned over to the President without any strings to it or earmarks upon it; but with more than 3-to-1 Democratic majority, it passed the House under gag rule and with very little debate. What has occurred since then every person here and every person in every American community knows. When the truth is fully known and the history is accurately written, the foul and rotten mess called relief will stink to high heaven and the whole dirty business will go down as one of the blackest pages in American history. The poorest and neediest of our people have not received the help they deserve, while the white-collar political parasites have fattened off the taxpayers. Discrimination and favoritism have been shown on every hand, and, for the first time in political history, public funds have been used for political purposes and employed to build up a gigantic machine in every precinct and township of every city and county in the United States, that the American people might be bribed with their own money in order to perpetuate in power the present ignoble crowd of destroyers.

The wild, wasteful expenditures of the past 3 years on temporary and useless projects, on boondoggling activities of inefficient and irresponsible parties, has no justification in law, precedent, or morals. We have encouraged indolence by rewarding idleness, and are in danger of fostering a generation of beggars and mendicants. Before many people in the remotest corner of our Republic build a chicken coop or repair a fence they first write to their Representative in Congress to see if there isn't some New Deal agency or appropriation which will pay the expense of it. Everywhere there is an attitude of "give me, give me, give me", and a feeling on the part of many that the Government is separate and apart from themselves. There are too many grown-ups who do not yet realize that they, themselves, are the Government, and that the only place Uncle Sam can get any money is out of their pockets. No government can give to its people anything it does not take from them.

Many people are now helping to pay the bill without realizing it in the increased cost of living. Most taxes are not direct, but are invisible, and today we are taxed from the cradle to the grave. The sheets and blankets under which you slept last night, you were taxed for, you paid a duty on your tooth paste and shaving cream this morning, the shoes on your feet, the hat on your head, the automobile you drive, the gas and oil you put in it, your ticket to the movies, the cigarette you light—on all these things and a thousand other commodities you are taxed, taxed, and taxed again. Not only is there a tax on the bacon and bread you will eat today, but your wife's cosmetics, furs, and jewels, if she is lucky enough to possess them, are all taxed 10 percent, and when you fish, hunt, play tennis or golf, don't forget that you pay a tax on your gun, rod, club, and racquet.

At the present time we have a monstrous tax bill being debated in the House, which no Member of Congress understands but which is supposed to raise more than $800,000,000 annually. Many of us believe it will destroy corporations, large and small, and will wipe out the investments of stockholders. Of all the loosely drawn, intricate, and ambiguous pieces of New Deal legislation, this is the most vague, indefinite, and uncertain. It will make good business for barristers, but the most expert Philadelphia lawyers would be unable to comprehend the meaning of such a jargon of unintelligible words. It would require an Einstein to understand the table of logarithms included in the bill, which was written by one of the "brain trusters"; and though it is estimated this measure will raise a little less than a billion dollars, President Roosevelt proposes to ask Congress to turn over to him before we adjourn this session an additional $1,500,000,000 for relief purposes. If money can buy an election, we do not have to wait until November to know what the results will be; but for myself, I have not lost all faith in the intelligence, character, and patriotism of the American people, and I am confident that at least the 300,000 native-born Americans in my district cannot be bought and sold as cattle and will never barter away their liberties.

In the name of philanthropy President Roosevelt and big Jim Farley are "playing politics with human misery." Under the guise of helping the people, these men, drunk with power and greedy for more, through the well-known practices of benevolent despots, are enslaving the American people. When will this patronizing paternalism cease? It is now only a short step to dictatorship in this country, and, though it is an old saying, it is still true that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

In his speech the other night at Baltimore the President courted the favor of youth. Already this administration has allocated $47,000,000 to be spent in the National Youth Administration, and Harry Hopkins proposes to spend $75,000,000 more in order to win the votes of the young people of our Nation. I do not think that the youth of our country desire to be spoon fed, and certainly they should be taught the lessons of self-respect and self-reliance. They should be made to understand early in life that the best security in the world a man can win is the security he wins for himself, and that when he comes to depend upon another, decay sets in; and that a nation, like an individual, can rise and progress only by its own strength. The spirit of our ancestors still beats in the breasts of our courageous and dauntless youth who want no honors or profits without just competition, and who want to win their own laurels by performance of difficult tasks and rugged duties. Make them the beneficiaries or recipients of effortless jobs or Government doles and hand-outs and we shall soon have a race of softies, incapable of making advancement and unworthy of any noble achievement. The whole philosophy of this paternalistic administration blights the soul, destroys the character, weakens the will, and wrecks the life of individual men and women. Its damning influence will continue for years to come, even if stopped now, and if the policy is sanctioned and continued by the American people then all I can say is "God pity us."

Youth may not realize, but age knows, that the experiences in life remembered are the hard ones and that the greatest satisfaction is derived from the performance of difficult tasks. American youth does not want to be coddled, but will respond to any challenge where arduous effort and stern self-discipline are required. The road of life is covered with sandpaper as much as with velvet, and indeed no normal human being would always want to live the life of ease and luxury. Mr. Roosevelt's clever speech is all the more dangerous because of its adroitness. In his inflammatory manner he incites youth to social revolution by encouraging the ruthless impulses of their perplexed and bewildered minds. In his characteristic way he attempts to drive a wedge between youth and age, as he already has done between capital and labor, employer and employee, creditor and debtor. Perhaps the most dangerous element in his whole mistaken philosophy is the setting of class against class. There can be no restoration of prosperity in this country or any happiness or peace of mind among its citizens so long as such a false philosophy is followed.

What Mr. Roosevelt should have told the American youth gathered at Baltimore was that they, themselves, would be compelled for the rest of their lives to carry the heavy burden which the wild, reckless spending orgy of the New Deal is now heaping upon them. It is not old age but youth that is to be pitied today, because the younger generation and several generations yet unborn will unfortunately inherit this legacy of lunacy and debt. To the young voters of America I would warn that their Government, from the day they become taxpayers until the day they die, will be going down into their pockets to take a part of their weekly pay envelope to pay for the mad follies of this administration. Youth is the innocent but the sure and inescapable victim of the New Deal spending spree. Though Candidate Roosevelt promised the American people economy in government, he has spent as much in 3 years as President as was spent in the first 124 years of our history. No more money was spent from George Washington to Woodrow Wilson, from the adoption of the Constitution to the outbreak of the World War, than has been lavishly scattered and prodigally wasted by the "squandermaniacs" in Washington. After 3 years of extreme and unreasonable experimentation on 130,000,000 Americans, we still have 12,000,000 men out of employment, which is practically as many as when the New Deal was inaugurated. We have more than 20,000,000 people on the relief rolls, and our national debt has been increased from approximately twenty-two to thirty-two billions of dollars, far in excess of what it was at the close of the World War, which, be it remembered, our Democratic friends kept us out of. In other words, after increasing our national debt by $10,000,000,000, we are practically back where we started from, and the end of spending is not yet in sight. What temporary gains were made were due to artificial shots in the arm which have prolonged the malady. The pain is stopped for a while, but the disease lingers on. We will soon have no water left with which to prime the pump. The well is already dry. A false prosperity has been created by spending money we do not have and by placing a mortgage on our children. Our expenditures are now 40 percent greater than our revenues.

This means that regardless of which party wins the election this fall, increased taxes are inescapable unless we resort to inflation, more radical than we now have, which, of course, is repudiation of a solemn obligation. Already the United States Government has violated the sanctity of contract with its own citizenry and is it to be wondered that honest and intelligent people have had their faith in the rectitude and integrity of their Government shaken? Last January the President told us there would be no new taxes, but now he is asking for nearly $1,000,000,000 additional and would ask for much more were there not an election this fall. The uncertainty of the election is the only brake that now holds the President in check. Return Roosevelt to the White House and grant sanction to his dangerous policies and this Nation will be confronted with bankruptcy if not anarchy. There are only two things that can be done about a debt—one is to pay it, the other is not to pay it. If the debt is paid, naturally taxes will be greatly increased, and if there are no additional taxes, the debt will be repudiated by printing-press money.

I fully realize, as do you, that the world is now going through one of its periodic transitions. It is only natural, logical, and inevitable that following a catastrophe of such gigantic magnitude as the World War we should be compelled, as every other participant in that savage struggle that exacted such a toll in life and property, to make certain social and economic readjustments. Being a young man, I have no fear of new theories, and I am not afraid of experiments so long as they are reasonable and carried out on a small scale until their worth is proved. I also know we can never go back to the old order just as it was. New ideas cramp some peoples' minds just as new shoes hurt their feet but not so with me. I know that without change there would be no progress, but I am not going to mistake mere change for progress. Change can be for the worse as well as for the better. That is what has happened under the New Deal.

Though young and still full of the spirit of adventure and willing to take a chance, I am old-fashioned enough to believe with Patrick Henry that the "only way to judge the future is by the past. * * * The only lamp by which to guide our feet is the lamp of experience." Experience is on the side of the Constitution under which we have lived, prospered, and become the richest and happiest people on the face of the earth. For 150 years our American principles and traditions have been tested, and any institution that has lived for a long time has good arguments for its existence. The egoist with colossal conceit can sneeringly refer to the Supreme Court as belonging to the "horse and buggy" days, but that Court has a century and one-half's glorious history back of it, and is the defender of the rights of the people. There are certain principles which are unalterable and eternal. Truth never changes, and the truths enunciated in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States are just as true today and just as much needed for the welfare of humanity as they were in the days of Thomas Jefferson and Alexander Hamilton. The principles of Free Masonry are just the same today as they were in the age of King Solomon or George Washington. The cardinal teachings of the Catholic Church are just the same and just as true at this hour as they were at the time of St. Peter or St. Thomas Aquinas. No one would want to repeal the Decalogue simply because it was written by Moses in the stone age. I prefer to follow experience rather than try every wild-eyed and unknown experiment. History is a better teacher than hysteria and much safer to follow. Whatever changes are necessary to bring back prosperity to a distressed, bewildered, and harassed people can be made without destroying the very foundations of our Government by abolishing the Supreme Court or wrecking the Constitution. One does not have to burn down his house to get rid of the mice in the pantry. One does not have to kill his dog in order to get rid of its fleas. In fact, a few fleas are good for any dog—they keep his mind off being a dog all the time.

My fellow countrymen, we have come to the parting of the ways. The issue is clear-cut. Today America stands at the crossroads. One path leads to constitutional, representative government such as we have always known and enjoyed; the other leads to a dictatorship of a European brand. The big question is, Shall America remain a democracy or become an autocracy? The issue is between slavery and freedom. After all, this country is ours, and those who govern us derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. They are not our masters, but our servants, subject always to our will, instead of our being subject to their capricious whims and fancies.

Those who condemn in wholesale manner the past and who have lost faith completely in our modern American system of government; those who are now preaching strange and spurious doctrines imported from abroad, and who would substitute new social theories and a different philosophy from any we have ever known, ask us what program we have to offer. First, let me say that if we had no program at all we should be fully justified, after our painful experience of the past 3 years, to rise up in a body and drive from the seats of the mighty those who are now prolonging this depression, holding the club of hunger over the heads of helpless people in their attempt to superimpose upon them a government totally foreign and altogether un-American. If a father should see his child rush on the tracks before an oncoming train, the first thing he would do would be to stop the child or rescue it from its danger before sitting down and giving the child a long lecture enumerating the many reasons why it is dangerous to walk on railroad tracks. When a man's house is on fire, he doesn't sit down, draw plans, and figure out a detailed program contemplating just what kind of wallpaper or paint he shall use in the reconstruction and repair of his damaged edifice; the first thing he does is to put out the fire which threatens to destroy his domicile. Today America is on fire and the danger is so great that men and women, regardless of race, party, or creed, should vigorously put an immediate stop to the dangerous, destructive policies of the man in the White House. I believe in pouring the oil where the squeak is, and the big squeak in this administration is none other than Franklin Delano Roosevelt, who is more Delano than he is Roosevelt.

However, the Republican Party will have a constructive program which all America will know about, after we nominate our candidate for the Presidency and adopt a platform at Cleveland. There are 100 men in the Republican Party today who would be far superior in every way to the present leader of the American people. Without attempting to dictate in the slightest the planks that should be incorporated in our platform, I do submit a few suggestions:

In the first place, the Republican Party should refuse to sidestep, pussyfoot, or evade the big issue in this campaign and should wholly and uncompromisingly repudiate the underlying fundamental philosophy and the entire idiotic new social and economic theories of the New Deal. We should pledge ourselves to halt the concentration of power in a Federal bureaucracy and should restore the American system of an indestructible union of sovereign independent States, insisting upon States' rights and local responsibility.

We should cut the cost of government to the bone by actually abolishing New Deal alphabetical agencies and discharging a vast army of political parasites who are not needed for the useless tasks they perform today. We should insist upon balancing the Budget, not so much by increasing taxation but by a drastic reduction in governmental expenditures.

As always in the past we should now insist upon sound money, an honest dollar, establish our fiscal affairs upon a firm and fixed basis, and put an end to the constant tinkering with the currency and the flirtation with inflation.

We should continue to oppose the League of Nations, the World Court, and every movement that would embroil us in foreign entanglements.

We should take politics out of civil service and adhere to the merit system in the selection of Government employees. Since the inception of the merit system, the percentage of Government employees covered by it has steadily grown under every President, reaching a peak of 80 percent just prior to Roosevelt's inauguration. Under Jim Farley's bossism, the percentage abruptly sank to 57 percent. These figures tell the tale.

We should preach a doctrine of plenty rather than scarcity and assist agriculture not by reducing production, since all wealth is the result of production, but give the farmer a moratorium on his indebtedness at a lower rate of interest, reduce taxes on real estate, teach him diversification of farm activities, develop and expand both our domestic and export markets, and give him, as we have given labor and industry, a tariff sufficiently high to prohibit the importation of commodities which can be produced within the confines of our own country.

We should immediately take the Government out of competition with private enterprise and compel the Government in its building program to submit to the same rules and regulations imposed upon private business while completing the work it has already undertaken. Certainly we should not do as President Roosevelt—strangle the life out of business while at the same time demanding that business itself solve the grave problem of unemployment. We should reestablish common honesty and decency in Government by carrying out the assurance that the Government will no longer violate the sanctity of contract, but will keep its word with its own citizens.

We should advocate only a reasonable, workable, and constitutional social-security program embracing old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, assistance to dependent children, helpless cripples, the blind, and maternal welfare.

We should immediately insist that the administration of relief be returned to the various States and local communities. By so doing we should cut the cost of administration in two by discharging the thousands upon thousands of relief authorities who are now drawing good salaries for doing nothing, and the people who are really suffering would receive more than they now get.

We should plead with the American people to remember with some pride the old-fashioned virtues of their fathers; to develop once more the spirit of initiative and self-reliance, and instead of idleness and destruction to practice the homely virtues of thrift and industry.

Above all else, we should affirm our undying faith in the Supreme Court and pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor to the preservation of the Constitution of the United States. On different occasions I have taken the oath to preserve, protect, and defend that sacred document. In my present office I have a vow in high heaven to uphold it. So has the President of the United States. I declare unto you, and do so deliberately, that any public official, whether he be potentate or pauper, whether he be President or police judge, who has taken that solemn oath in the presence of God and his fellow countrymen, who has sealed that oath with his lips on the Holy Bible, and who then ignores it or deliberately violates it—that official, regardless of his race, party, or creed, is guilty of treason, deserves impeachment, and should receive the eternal opprobrium of his fellow countrymen. I repeat what I said in this very room last February to the Association of Young Republicans of Missouri at their annual Lincoln Day banquet: "No man is better than his word."

Let us enter this campaign without any hope or expectation of personal gain or reward. What happens to me individually amounts to little; what happens to my country amounts to everything. We shall engage the enemy in battle, not for the sake of winning an election for the Republican Party nor with the intention of defeating the Democratic Party, but as lovers of liberty for all; and as true patriots, let us join hands and heads and hearts as we go forth to preserve America.

YOUNG AMERICA AND THE NEW DEAL

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered by myself.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CALE of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me before the thirtieth annual Grant dinner commemorating the birth of Ulysses S. Grant, held by the Unconditional-Capitol City Republican Club and the Young Men's Republican Club of Albany, N. Y., on April 28:

Little persuasion was needed for me to accept your invitation to participate in this gathering. Two impelling reasons caused me to readily consent.

I am especially pleased to be with you tonight because you represent that organization formed over three score years ago to advance the election of Grant as President of the United States, who was to fulfill in a large measure the principles of liberty and equality voiced by the founder of our party, Abraham Lincoln. In this day of such uncertainty for the future of our country, today when there are those who for base, selfish, and political purposes would seek to arouse the hatred of class against class, today when there are some who would violate the sanctity of personal liberty and security, today when there are some who would flaunt the flag of communism and fascism in the face of real Americanism, who would by governmental edict seek to direct and control the lives and activities of all of our citizens, who would usurp unto themselves the legislative powers of the representatives of the people, and who would devitalize our highest Court which is and has been the guardian of the rights of our people today, when there are those who would seek to tear down and destroy those fundamentals of our Constitution that have made us a prosperous, a happy, and a secure people, it is a source of real inspiration to find that the young people of America, and more especially the young Republicans are as active and vigorous in their determination that the principles of Lincoln and Grant should be carried forward and made more secure as were your predecessors in their zeal for the election of Grant himself. I am proud to be with such an organization, it has strengthened my own confidence in our future welfare.

My further reason for quickly accepting your invitation is the opportunity it afforded me to revisit the scenes where I once studied law and learned something about our Constitution. It was here that I first learned of our three branches of Government—executive, legislative, and judicial—and that each of them had very positive, but limited powers. Here, too, did I learn of the inviolable right of a person to be secure in his person, his house, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures.

In this city did I become impressed with the right of our people to worship freely, to speak freely, and to write freely. And again, it was here that I was taught the mechanics of amending our Constitution, of the very definite and positive way in which it is to be changed if circumstances indicate that a change is needed.

In the past few years, having witnessed at first hand the open violation by the Democratic administration of these fundamentals of our basic law, principles which my father and my forefathers have enjoyed throughout the existence of our Nation, I have become more convinced than ever before that these are the groundwork of the success and happiness of our people and am unwilling that they should continue to be so openly and flagrantly desecrated without some effort on my part and the part of other young people of the country to stem the tide of rising socialism. And so, it is good to be in Albany again, to revisit the scenes of my legal training, and to again become imbued with the spirit that animated the founders of this Republic when they met in solemn sessions to formulate the Constitution.

Being somewhat youthful myself, I feel that perhaps it is not presumptious for me to speak in behalf of millions of young persons of the country, who of late, like myself, have become somewhat bewildered by the political tenets which we have heard mouthed so frequently. We have heard a good deal of the evils of the old order, of the reaction of the "Old Guard", and of the failure of our system to properly and fully safeguard the rights of our people. We have heard much about the Elysian fields of the New Deal, of the "more abundant life" that is assured to each of us, of the "planned economy" that a beneficent government is going to prepare for us and of the "social rights" of mankind. Those who would seek to offer honest criticism of many of the nostrums of the New Deal and conscientiously oppose the extravagant spending orgy of the administration are named "tories", "reactionaries", or "backers of bloated bondholders." On the other hand, those who are most active and outspoken in behalf of this so-called new order are hailed as being divinely inspired, as a Moses leading the children of Israel out of the wilderness, and the liberator of humanity from the "shackles of entrenched greed."

With all these epithets and encomiums being hurled about us, it is small wonder that the youth of the country, having faith as it does in its fellow man and wanting to believe the things that it is told, is bewildered, confused, and at loss to know which to believe and which to discredit.

Young America has no delusions about either the Old Deal or the New Deal. Those who are honest with themselves, must admit that there have been grave abuses of public trust in the past; that the Government did not as fully take steps to protect the rights and interests of the common person as it might have. True, there were some instances in which the old order might have done better, but that does not mean that the whole American system, which is interwoven as an integral part of the old order, must be relegated into the discard and completely cast aside for this new concept of society that has swept Europe in recent years and has likewise become a component part of the New Deal. We are quite willing that the abuses of the past might be corrected, but we are entirely unwilling that their correction should be brought about at the expense of losing our heritage as American citizens. We do not ask that the hands of the clock be turned backward; but, much as we disapprove of the laissez faire of past days, we would greatly prefer it to the dark days of the medieval ages toward which this administration is rapidly and surely leading us, when man was but a puppet of the state, directed and controlled in all of his commonplace activities by edicts of the Crown, paying annual tribute at exorbitant rates to his overlord for the privilege of a bushel of grain and a hovel in which to sleep.

What is the basis of the charge against the Republican Party that it is dominated by the "Old Guard" and that it is the party of reaction? No one will deny that there are a few persons who have been dominant behind the scenes of our party's affairs for a great many years and who in a large degree are responsible for those failures of our party to fulfill the expectations of our voters in recent years. I speak of those who do not hold public office, but who, under cover of darkness and behind closed doors, gather for the selection of candidates and formulation of party principles. To me they are the "Old Guard", and the sooner they realize that their presence is no longer needed or wanted, the better it will be for the welfare of the Republican Party and of the Nation. It is not necessary to name names; they know themselves and should be ready to step aside while it can be done gracefully. But simply because a person is old and has been a Republican for a great many years and has been prominent in public affairs does not mean that he is a reactionary. Of course, my field in politics has been limited, but I can truthfully say that the Republican Members of Congress who are to my mind conservative to the degree of reaction can be counted on a single finger of a single hand. There may be instances in other legislative bodies and other public offices of persons of our party who are blind to progress; I do not know of them and certainly would not attempt to justify them.

As the youngest Republican in Congress and, but one, the youngest of the entire membership, I am proud to accept as my leader there BERTRAND H. SNELL, who has sat in the Halls of Congress for over a score of years, rendering invaluable service to his party and the Nation, fighting with vigor and determination only those measures of the New Deal that he believes to be obnoxious to Americanism. Surely it cannot be said that he is a reactionary or a Tory or blind to progress. Nor can it be said that he is deaf to the ideas of youth or to their participation in our party's councils, and in this I speak from experience. Never have I gone to him with a problem that confronted me but that he gave me the full benefit of his advice and experience. Never have I asked consideration from him but that he gave it to me without hesitation if he was able. Never has a conference of our party members been called but that the young members were included and given an opportunity to express themselves, and never have any of us been told how to vote. So far as I am concerned, I have no quarrel with the elder Republicans. I realize that we need the benefit of their experience, of their ability and counsel, just as I am convinced that if the Republican Party is to be successful there must be no failure or refusal to recognize the reasonable desires of the young Republican or resentment of his presence in the party conclaves. There is room for both the old and the young, there is a crying need for the presence of both in the management of our party's affairs, and unless cooperation between the two can be accomplished the future of the Republican Party is doomed.

The real difference between the Republican Party and the Democratic Party of today, as I see it, was very tersely spoken by the President in his Baltimore speech of 2 weeks ago when, in speaking of the loss by youth of its enthusiasm and ideals as it grows older, he said, "That is one reason why the world into which they go gets better so slowly." In all the history of the world there has been but one individual who, in the space of 3 youthful years was able to revolutionize the entire land in its moral and social concepts and even then the process of spreading the word of the Nazarene was long, protracted, and arduous, and even in this day, nearly 2,000 years since, the struggle for the existence of Christianity still goes on. Centuries were required to liberate man from the economic serfdom of the Dark Ages, gradually culminating in the formation of the Republic and the conception of our Constitution embodying the rights of the common man against autocracy either of government or of wealth. The world has gotten better slowly, but for the very reason of its slowness the betterment has become certain and more secure and will remain secure if the youth and persons of all ages will hold fast to the fundamentals of freedom and refuse to be carried away by the nostrums of those whose regard of themselves is a blasphemy of the Man of Galilee.

How is the enthusiasm of youth to attain quickly its ideals? No plan is offered to us that will not destroy our fundamental concepts of society. The counterpart of the Chief Executive, in speaking before the students of New York University a few days ago said, "The answer of the old school of economics isn't the one. There must be something else. I'm not here today to tell you what those changes will be because I don't know." Quite characteristic of the whole New Deal are those words, "Something is wrong with the system; we don't know what it is so we will discard the whole thing and try something new, something that we are not sure of but at least it is something different from what you have had."

Before we are ready to take something new we want to know that that something is going to leave us better than we were before. We do not want to experiment with ourselves or with the lives of our children. We want to be sure.

And therein is the general policy of the Republican Party now and throughout its history. It has not been blind to progress; in its conservatism it has waited until the new idea has been thoroughly discussed, completely understood, with the common conclusion that the remedy is sound, before it has taken the step. I am sure that the conservatism of our party, its caution and unwillingness to rush into unknown and untried ventures, no matter how romantic or idealistic they may have seemed, has been largely responsible for the prosperous history of our country and our people. We have no disagreement with the objectives of the President; we, too, would forever banish unemployment, want in reclining years, low wages, unhealthful working and living conditions. Our difference lies not in the objective but in the means of obtaining it. Many of us honestly are convinced that the policies of the past 3 years will defeat the very objectives we seek; that they will produce a less rather than a more abundant life; that honest business does not have a fair chance when government goes into competition with it or seeks to control it. There can be no social security without economic, business, industrial, and financial security, and we now have none of them.

In any fair appraisal of the New Deal it must be regarded not in the light of what it is now, but what it would have been had it not been for the Supreme Court. We must not quickly forget the N. R. A. and the A. A. A., through which the President sought to impose his revolution upon society. These are but two of the prominent vehicles of the New Deal; there are many others that are quietly carrying out their socialistic programs.

And so, when young America looks at the New Deal in its entirety, there is little in it that appeals to any of us who seek to achieve for ourselves the security of the average man. Strip it of its nice words and beautiful phrases and there will be found little to attract the young man whose goal in life is to have a job, a home, and a family, to save his earnings for the education of his children and for the care of himself in his old age, to perhaps rise above the level of his fellow worker if his ability, his ambition, and his enterprise will permit him to be carried to greater heights. The President very appropriately voiced the enthusiasm and ideals of youth when he said at Baltimore, "Your objective is an opportunity to make an honest living; a reasonable chance to improve your condition in life as you grow older; a practical assurance against want and suffering in your old age; and with it all the right to participate in the finer things of life—good health, clean amusement, and a part in the satisfactions of the arts, the sciences, and religion."

No one can take exception to that statement. That is just what we do want. Certainly living off our Government at subsistence wages of $44 per month will not give it to us. Certainly we cannot "improve our condition in life" if, as laborers, we are to be told the amount of our wages, the hours that we are to work, and that our chance of promotion is slight, or, as farmers, we are told where and what we are to sow and when and for how much we are to reap and sell our crops. Certainly we cannot "assure ourselves against want and suffering in our old age" if, as businessmen, we have the fingers of government continuously about our throat and are taxed to the breaking point to support the wanton, reckless, and profligate spending that all these experiments are costing. Certainly there is little incentive for any of us to work hard and to be thrifty, to make an honest living, when we are told that one out of every six persons in the country is in the employ of some government and that we are supporting them to the extent of 25 cents of every dollar that we earn.

Jobs are what we want, and not relief nor governmental paternalism. We know that industry cannot employ us so long as its activities are circumscribed by the strangle hold of an autocratic government and its lifeblood sapped by the exactions of a spendthrift but greedy rulership. It is only through private business that we can hope to get the kind of a job that will give us the things we want, but private employers, already burdened and restricted with handicaps of the New Deal legislation, are justly fearful of what new restraints may be placed upon them by this administration. Industry is anxious to employ us, but it cannot add employees unless it can afford to pay them, and it cannot afford to pay until it is given an opportunity to make profits. Unemployment can never be corrected by government, only private industry can do that, no matter how many billions are spent by the Government in the attempt. Let government give business more than a "breathing spell"; let it go ahead and work out its own problems and become strong and healthy before it is again rolled into the operating room for further experimental mutilation. No one will deny that it is the duty of government to regulate business for the protection of the investor, the laborer, and the consumer, but a tyrannous interference with private enterprise can only end with disaster to us all.

The young man does not ask for much in this world. All we want is the same equality and the same opportunity to work and to save that our forefathers had. We do not want to be cut all according to the same pattern, as is the inescapable result of a regimented business. "Planned economy" and "governmental paternalism" may give us a little finer clothing, a little more food, and perhaps a nicer place in which to live, but all that will not be worth the sacrifice we must make. Rather would we be content with scanty clothing, meager food, and an humble home and know that the opportunity lies before us to rise to whatever heights our ambition, our self-reliance, our enterprise, and our thrift and ability may carry us than to have these finer things furnished us by a benevolent government but bought at the price of a broken morale, a stifled initiative, and a blurred vision.

Not only is the outlook dismal for those who seek employment but also for those who are fortunate enough to have a job when we consider the tremendous cost of all this New Deal experimentation and realize that some day we must foot the bill. When the New Dealers took over the Government in 1932 the national debt was approximately $21,000,000,000, but when they leave it at the end of this year it will be over $40,000,000,000. Year after year billions more were spent than were collected in taxes. In these days of mathematical hieroglyphics the meaning of a billion dollars has moved into obscurity. Reduce the term to minutes and you will perhaps a bit more readily understand the gigantic proportions of the word. The debt which Mr. Roosevelt will leave behind at the end of his first term has been increased by him to the extent of $20 for every minute since the birth of Christ and over $250 for every minute since our Government was created 150 years ago. To express it a bit differently so that we may fully appreciate what has happened, for every family in the United States Mr. Roosevelt has added the burden of paying over $600 more than that family was obligated to pay when he became President. This is what the New Deal has cost each one of us who is the head of a family, and this in spite of new taxes and increases in the old. It is the equivalent of a mortgage upon our home, our car, our savings account, our insurance, and our wages for all time in the future until the debt is repaid. The burden of repaying the debt does not rest upon the shoulders of those who are now doing the spending or benefiting by the money being spent, but will be borne by the young America of today and their children and grandchildren. Over a decade was necessary to reduce our national indebtedness by $12,000,000,000; by the same token scores of years must pass before this great burden is turned aside. The thrift and saving and hard work of all must be called into action. But we must not forget that we have obligations to others besides our Government. We have families, children to feed and clothe, to educate, and to establish in business or some other means of livelihood, and someday we, too, will be old and perhaps in want.

We do not object to the Government's caring for those who are in need and at the same time are unable to obtain employment. We are quite willing that they should be cared for, and believe that such is the duty of Government, but we are entirely unwilling either that the resources of the country should be enlisted to create and encourage a horde of people to continue to be dependent upon their Government so long as the flow of funds continue or that the Nation's wealth should be used to entrench any political party in the seats of government. Entrenched greed in business or industry, to us, is no different than entrenched partisanship. If the New Deal were guilty of no other violation of public trust deserving its ouster at the polls next November, the fact that it has used, and admittedly so, the moneys of the public designed for relief for the advancement of the cause of "new dealism" merits for them immediate ejection. Surely no fair-minded citizen, however partisan he may be, will permit such a flagrant abuse of public trust to continue.

Probably we would not have justification for complaint against the wanton and wasteful spending of our money if it were shown to have done some good and had in some measure corrected the evils against which they were directed. When the administration came into power the unemployed were numbered at some eight or nine million; today that number has swollen to over 11,000,000, and over 22,000,000 of persons are on relief. Spending the public moneys has not solved the problem, nor has regimentation of business and agriculture done it. There can be but one answer: Turn back to the States and the several localities the responsibility for caring for the needy and give business a chance to repair its own leaks that it may of itself absorb the unemployed.

If the Nation weathers the crisis now confronting it, the Constitution and the Union of States will be stronger than ever before. I have confidence that the American people inevitably will decide the right if they have all of the facts before them. Those who are on the paying end of the New Deal outnumber those on the receiving end, over three to one, and if the payers will combine their efforts and act together, the rescue can be made absolutely certain. It is our duty as young Republicans to not only acquaint ourselves of the true nature of the New Deal but to actively see that that information is passed on to others who might not know it. We must take an increased devotion to the cause of human freedom, individual liberty, and American civilization and pledge ourselves to complete the unfinished work remaining before us that we may hand down to our children's children the priceless heritage bequeathed to us. To those who would wreck the American system, let us say, "Thou shalt not destroy enterprise, ambition, and opportunity; thou shalt not crucify initiative and genius upon a cross of regimentation; thou shalt forever keep the gateway open to the youth of America."

PROGRESS AND DEVELOPMENT IN WATERWAY IMPROVEMENT

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by inserting in the RECORD a speech by General Markham, Chief of Engineers, before the Rivers and Harbors Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by General Markham, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, April 27, 1936:

Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, it is again a privilege to appear before the membership of the National River and Harbor Congress and to describe briefly the progress and developments in waterway improvements since your last annual meeting. It is gratifying to appear before your Congress, as its influence has ever been progressive in the development of a comprehensive and intelligent permanent policy and improvement program for the utilization of our national water resources in the interest of the people as a whole.

During the past 3 years, with the exception of an item of $10,000,000 provided in the second deficiency appropriation of 1935, the funds for new work on river and harbor improvement have been provided entirely from the several emergency appropriations, and the regular departmental appropriations have been for maintenance operations only. These emergency funds have permitted an augmented program which has made possible the accelerated rate of progress in the completion of authorized projects. They have totaled $483,000,000, and have provided for the average direct employment of 55,000 persons, and for the indirect employment of at least that many more. In addition to the emergency funds, approximately $128,000,000 has been made available during the same period from regular appropriations for maintenance operations, making a total of $611,000,000 in 3 years, or more than $200,000,000 per year. The total water-borne commerce of the United States averaged more than 414,000,000 tons annually in the period.

We are particularly pleased that permanent worth-while improvements have been accomplished with these funds which, at the same time, have provided a substantial measure of employment relief, and have been of effective aid in stimulating the heavy construction industry.

We have recognized the desirability of undertaking our operations by contract whenever practicable and when satisfactory prices could be obtained. In spite of the difficulties in undertaking relief work by contract to meet the requirements of the relief program, we succeeded in preparing a form of contract for such work, with the approval of the Works Progress Administration, which has enabled the major portion of the relief work entrusted to our Department to be successfully executed by contract. In obtaining exemptions for certain skilled positions, and other minor adjustments necessitated by the relief requirements, we have had the full cooperation of the Works Progress Administration. During the past year 66 percent of the new work on river and harbor improvements was undertaken by contract, as compared with 34 percent with Government plant and hired labor. This represents almost a direct reversal of the percentage which obtained some 20 years ago which has been made possible by the cooperation of the contractors and their willingness to meet the requirements of the Department and at the same time to submit reasonable bids for the work in view.

The exigencies of the relief program during the past year again necessitated the prompt advertisement of work to provide immediate employment.

Many important projects were completed, to include the Delaware River from Philadelphia to the sea; the final completion of the last link in the intracoastal waterway along the Atlantic coast providing 1,360 miles of protected inner passage for small boats from the Delaware River to Miami, Fla.; the 25-foot channel in New Haven Harbor; the Raritan River to Arthur Kill Cut-off Channel in New York; the 32-foot Houston Ship Channel; and the Brazos Island Harbor entrance channel. Substantial progress was achieved at Boston Harbor; in the completion of highway and railway bridges across the Cape Cod Canal, and the enlargement of the canal dimensions; the improvement of the New York State Barge Canal; the New York and New Jersey Channel; the extension of the Delaware River improvement to Trenton; extension of the canalization project on the upper Mississippi River; the completion of the stabilization works on the Missouri River practically to Omaha; the replacement of six old dams on the Ohio River by two high dams with movable crests located at Montgomery Island and at Gallipolis; the extension of the breakwater at Los Angeles; the improvement of Tampa Harbor, Fla.; and a number of other important projects urgently needed in the interests of navigation. The upper Mississippi River improvement has advanced to a point where 3 years should witness its full completion; the Bonneville Dam on the Columbia River is well ahead of schedule. There has been no period in our history which has witnessed a comparable attainment in the development of our rivers and harbors.

During the next fiscal year there will be a return to the established system in which the new funds for river and harbor improvements are to be provided from the annual War Department appropriation. This will permit the selection of work to meet the urgent needs of navigation without prime importance being given to relief requirements, although, of course, that factor must be taken into consideration in the allocation of funds. It is understood that the conferees have agreed on a total appropriation of $161,670,899 for the preservation and maintenance of existing navigation works and new improvements, of which $115,000,000 will be available for new improvements. A large portion of those funds is required for the continuation of work now under way started with funds from the relief appropriations but not utilizable in its present condition. A small balance will be available to start work on new projects, and should suffice to meet the more pressing needs of navigation. The maintenance funds appear sufficient, with rigid care, to maintain project dimensions as required in the interests of commerce. Until the appropriation is definitely established the program for the next fiscal year cannot be definitely prepared, but its preparation will be governed by the requirements of navigation.

The Emergency Relief appropriations have also provided funds for a small number of flood-control projects to include the continuation of work on the Mississippi River and on the Sacramento River, authorized by Congress; a comprehensive program in the Muskingum conservancy district under cooperative agreement with that district; the construction of the joint navigation and flood-control dams at Fort Peck on the Missouri River, and near Grafton on the Tygart River; the Conchas Dam in New Mexico; the Sardis Dam in Mississippi; and a number of small levee and dike projects which were found to meet the requirements of the relief program.

The tremendous increase in flood damages throughout the United States which has inevitably resulted from the industrial development of our river basins, and the growth in population with corresponding increase in land values, has created a strong sentiment throughout the United States for participation by the Federal Government in flood-control work.

The Constitution of the United States has conferred on Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." In the early days of the Republic, there was serious doubt whether this power to regulate included the right to improve, but the enlightened decision of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Gibbons against Ogden established clearly and indubitably the exclusive power of Congress with respect to the interstate waterways of the country, and marked the birth of a permanent Federal policy of river and harbor improvements which has been expanded and more clearly defined from year to year with the advance of population and the increasing need for commercial transportation.

While the Constitution clearly gives Congress the power to authorize the National Government to improve waterways for navigation and interstate commerce, it has not been determined that the Government has responsibility for constructing flood works generally, and a Federal policy with respect thereto has never been enacted legislatively, although Congress has authorized the construction of protective works in certain specific cases to include the Sacramento River, the Lake Okeechobee project, and the Mississippi River project. Public opinion, now realizing the magnitude and extent of flood losses, appears to recognize that destructive floods, together with contributory conditions of land misuse, erosion, and accelerated run-off of rain water, the resulting siltation of streams and reservoirs and impairment of the navigability of rivers, which combine to upset orderly processes and to cause losses of life and property and the destruction of national resources, constitute a menace to national welfare. A strong public demand has developed for flood-prevention measures and the coordinated control of erosion and run-off to ameliorate soil erosion and to conserve water resources.

The investigation and improvement of rivers and other waterways by the Federal Government for flood control and other purposes are under the jurisdiction of, and are prosecuted by the War Department. Coordinate studies and construction activities on drainage basin lands and small headwater streams, including the construction of small ponds and check dams involving incidental flood control, but primarily for the purpose of silt control and soil and water conservation, are under the jurisdiction of, and are prosecuted by the Department of Agriculture.

There has been in the past no conflict, nor is there any occasion for conflict in the future, in the execution of the works charged to the two Departments. The theory has been advanced that a large number of small dams forming reservoirs with minor storage capacity far up on the headwater streams, together with check dams still farther up such headwater streams, will form a substitute for the major structures and great impoundments proposed for the control of floods on major streams. Headwater structures are of great utility in the conservation of soil, in reducing minor floods, and in subsidiary benefits to include the reduction of siltation in major reservoirs. However, they would not prevent the cataclysmic floods which have so dramatically impressed themselves on the country at large during recent months. This great downpour of waters may be controlled only by major engineering structures providing great impoundment areas, or by the construction of suitable works for the direct protection of definite areas.

The investigation developed by the War Department in its surveys authorized by Congress have found some 1,600 waterway projects, with a total construction cost of $8,000,000,000, including approximately 600 flood-control projects, with a construction cost of $1,160,000,000. More than one-half of these projects would not appear economically warranted at the present time, in that the estimated construction costs exceed the benefits derived therefrom. In many projects the advantages which would result from their construction accrue to the people in the immediate vicinity, and it would certainly appear that a proportion of their expense should be borne by the interests immediately benefited. Where localities directly benefited by remedial works cannot meet in full the cost of such works, the Federal Government might well participate generously. However, complete responsibility for such protection should not be placed on the Federal Government. We shall always have flood and drought, heat and cold, earthquake and wind, lightning and tidal wave, which are all too frequent in their afflictions. The Government cannot be an insurer of its citizens against the hazard of elements and cannot undertake to reimburse them for loss and damages incurred under such conditions, although it is chargeable with the rebuilding of public works and the humanitarian duty of relieving its citizens from distress.

General flood-control legislation is now receiving the consideration of Congress, although the policy of Congress with respect to the participation of the Federal Government has not as yet been indicated. It does seem axiomatic that States and other local authorities should supply all lands and assume financial responsibility for damages that may result from the construction of flood-control projects. It would be a far-reaching precedent for the Government to buy the land and property requisite for protective works to the end of increasing the value or security of the private lands and properties to be protected and most inadvisable for it in generously helping a given section of the country to render itself liable for consequential damages. There are many Federal activities which contribute to the general welfare of the country through the improvement of lands and streams which are more or less distinctive in character and are now being planned or prosecuted by a separate department or agency of the Government. Most of these activities differ to such a degree in their conception and their prosecution as to require very little coordination between the several agencies to make them effective and efficient. The Army Engineers of the War Department are concerned with public improvements for direct and immediate control of floods which may be accomplished by the construction of levees, the enlargement of the discharge capacity of the natural channels, the provision of means of escape by diversion from the main channels into emergency channels or excess flood waters, and the construction of reservoirs to withhold from the natural channels in excess of their discharge capacities these flood waters. General plans are available for projects for the direct control of floods over the United States, costing more than any amount which can reasonably be devoted to that purpose, including the rivers and localities where the recent devastating floods have caused such damages and disorders as to attract widespread public attention. Our organization is prepared to initiate and prosecute vigorously any flood-control measures which may be authorized by the Congress as the necessary funds are provided.

COINAGE OF 50-CENT PIECES COMMEMORATING ANNIVERSARY OF ADMISSION TO UNION OF STATE OF ARKANSAS

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 11688) providing for a change in the design of the 50-cent pieces authorized to be coined in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. TERRY. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will withhold the objection.

Mr. TERRY. I hope the gentleman will not object to this bill being taken up now. It is for a 50-cent piece in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union. The celebration begins on the 2d of June. It is imperative that action be taken at this time, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, I will not object to this bill, but this is about the fifteenth bill coming in here authorizing the coinage of coins. It seems to me the administration should get these all together and do it at one time. It would save a lot of the time of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized and directed to provide for a series of not more than three different designs of to be placed on the reverse side of the 50-cent pieces to be coined in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union", approved May 14, 1934.

The United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the necessary dies and other preparations for such coinage.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "a series of not more than three different designs of" and insert "one additional design of not less than twenty-five thousand."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks made earlier today on the war-minerals bill and include certain excerpts from the hearings.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

MARINE CASUALTY INVESTIGATION BOARD

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, by authority of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 8599) to provide for a change in the designation of the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection, to create a marine casualty investigation board, and increase efficiency in administration of the steamboat-inspection laws, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this new board that is to be created going to cost anything?

Mr. BLAND. I do not recall the cost. This bill passed the House at the last session. It is one of the safety-at-sea measures and provides for the reorganization of the Steamboat Inspection Service.

Mr. RICH. What is the new commission? Is that for the purpose of handling this reorganization?

Mr. BLAND. No. The bill changes the name of the present Bureau of Steamboat Inspection to that of Marine Inspection. The bill provides for traveling inspectors and also for a Marine Casualty Board where there are accidents.

Mr. RICH. Does it set up a new commission for that purpose?

Mr. BLAND. The Senate bill set up a permanent board. The House bill provided boards to investigate casualties as they arose.

Mr. RICH. Just remember that is another Democratic board.

Mr. BLAND. That is all right; we will remember what the Democrats do.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does this bill affect radio operators on steamships?

Mr. BLAND. As amended by the Senate they are not affected. In the bill that passed the House they were brought under some regulation; I do not remember just what.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

THE ROBINSON-PATMAN BILL

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD an address delivered by the junior Senator from Minnesota, Senator BENSON, on the subject of the Robinson-Patman bill over a Nation-wide radio hook-up on the evening of April 25 last.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address by Senator ELMER A. BENSON, of Minnesota, made over the National Broadcasting Co. network on the evening of April 25:

I hope to speak tonight to an audience representative of this Nation's producers, consumers, and independent distributors. I feel that the farmers who produce the necessities of life, the consumers who buy, and the independent merchants who sell the necessities of life, and who are a vital part of the communities which they have helped to build, have a common interest in the passage at this session of Congress of the Robinson-Patman bill. In order that my discussion may be clear, in the few minutes allotted to me I want to ask and to answer these questions:

What is the merchandising situation in America, and how does that situation affect the producers, consumers, and independent merchants? What is the Robinson-Patman bill? Is it an anti-chain bill, or a chain-store tax bill, or simply an antitrust measure? What will the bill do if enacted into law? What evils will it cure? How do the trade practices that exist and the remedies this bill provides affect the producer? How do they affect the consumer? How will this bill affect the independent merchants and the cities, towns, and villages they have helped to build?

Let's deal first with the merchandising situation in America. The great majority of manufacturers, processors, brokers, cooperatives, and independent merchants in this country are comparatively small independents, without spokesmen through any powerful lobby, and with no voice except through their own respective trade associations.

There are 5,000 large wholesalers in this country. There are 750 large and powerful chain-store systems. In all there are 7,061 chain-store organizations.

Seventy-five percent of the retail business done in America is done by the independent retailers, so 75 percent of the wholesalers and brokers and manufacturers are dependent upon the success of the independent retailer for the successful sale of their products.

There are over 50,000 manufacturers, processors, canners, packers, refiners, and converters. There are over 1,500 large general food brokers. There are 5,000 large wholesale grocers in 2,200 distributing centers. There are 1,544,000 independent merchants throughout this Nation facing extermination and 3,870 chain-store owners doing the exterminating.

The owners of these chain stores, that do less than one-fourth of the Nation's retail business, have thrown a smoke screen about the controversy over the Robinson-Patman bill. They have tried to make the Nation's consumers believe that the recipients of unfair price discrimination are the people of the country and that you as consumers get the benefit of the chiseling done among chiselers.

Let me quote some facts from the last complete United States retail census. In 1933 the independent merchants of America sold at retail $18,000,000,000 worth of goods. The chain stores of the country sold a little over $6,000,000,000 worth of goods in 1933, and the $6,000,000,000 that was paid by American consumers to chain stores represented 25 percent of all of the retail business done in the United States. That 25 percent of all of the money spent by the American people over the counters was headed into pockets of a few people in the large centers of population who own and dominate the chain-store systems. I did not say it all went into their pockets, but the profit on it did.

The 75 percent of the business that was done by independent merchants was shared by 1,500,000 proprietors of 1,349,337 stores. The 25 percent of the business that was done by the chains was done by 141,000 stores and shared by only 4,000 proprietors. On that 25 percent of the Nation's business they made a gross profit of over 26 percent. In my home State of Minnesota 30,416 independent merchants did a business of $450,000,000 in 1933 and 2,881 chain stores did a business of $103,000,000. Now, let us look to the trend of trade and industrial practices today.

This trend is for the manufacturer to make just enough of any commodity so that, under the mockery of an artificial law of supply and demand, he can sell this limited supply of the commodity at a padded price that will bring to him for the smallest investment and factory operation the highest and most exorbitant profit.

What is the eventual end of such a trend in such a system? The manufacturer will buy, not all that the country can produce but just enough of what the country can produce to provide just those articles that he will be able to sell at an exorbitant price. Then, because of his limited output, he will create an artificial scarcity. Because of this artificial scarcity, he will call upon the inoperative law of supply and demand as an excuse to raise his price beyond the reach of the common man.

The wealthier few who can pay the exorbitant prices that result from the artificial scarcity will make him more money operating his factory a quarter of capacity than he could make if he operated it at full capacity, produced four times as much, employed four times as many men. The farmer, the producer, will have no place to sell the things he produces, because the majority of workers will have nothing with which to buy them.

The vast majority will have no place to work to make the money to pay for things to wear and eat, and the vast majority of farmers will have no place to sell the things they raise. This is the philosophy of the favored few and the philosophy of chain-store practices. These practices are only an example in this trend of our economy of scarcity.

The vast chain-store enterprises in this country represent seven or eight billions of dollars. They are consolidating in the hands of a few a wealth far greater than the entire outlay of the United States Government for the relief of one-fifth of the Nation's population. These chains are today conducting a united and organized lobby, virtually as powerful, and surely as sinister, as was the notorious utility-holding-company lobby that was exposed in the last session of this Congress.

These chain-store interests and this chain-store lobby have set out to defeat the Robinson-Patman bill by two major pieces of trickery. First, they are attempting to arouse the consumers of this country to bitterness and antagonism toward the independent merchants who are their neighbors and friends, and who so often have been their patient creditors. They have tried to sell these consumers on the idea that the Robinson-Patman bill will increase the prices they pay for the necessities of life. Permit me to say that it is as brazen a falsehood and as contemptible treachery as has ever been attempted by any lobby, because it seeks to aline friend against friend so that a few millionaire chain-store magnates may reach into the consumers' pockets for a few more dollars.

Second, the chain-store lobby has sought to convince the public of this country and the Congress that the bill puts a penalty on efficiency and seeks to eliminate competition. In other words, that it seeks to restrain artificially the progressive merchandising methods of chain stores and mail-order houses for someone's selfish protection.

The chain-store interests launched their attempt to fool and trick the consumers of this country along about the first of March. They flooded the country with propaganda charging that enactment of the Robinson-Patman bill will cost consumers of the United States $750,000,000 a year. This is a contemptible misrepresentation.

It is as contemptible as their closely allied efforts to sell the public on the idea that this is a bill to increase prices by increasing chain-store costs of operation. This bill does not put a penalty on efficiency.

It puts a penalty on crookedness.

It does not penalize any person or corporation, whether that person or corporation be a chain store, a mail-order house, a manufacturer, a wholesaler, or an independent merchant. I should have said it does not penalize any of them if they play square.

The Robinson-Patman bill is just what it is entitled. A bill to establish and require fair trade practices in merchandising. It provides no special privileges for the independent merchant that would be denied the multimillionaire operators of vast chain-store systems. It places no added burden on multimillionaire merchandisers, but it does outlaw robbery as robbery is now practiced by some of those merchandisers. It levies no tax on any store of any kind. It only guarantees to the independent and unorganized merchant the same rights that are accorded by some manufacturers to vast chain-store systems.

The Robinson-Patman bill does not compel any manufacturer or wholesaler to charge any higher price for any article to any chain-store system, but it does compel that seller to quote the same price for the same quantity to every independent merchant buying under the same conditions.

As the author of the bill, Congressman WRIGHT PATMAN, himself so clearly put it, under the Robinson-Patman bill a factory cannot sell 25 percent of its output to a chain-store corporation at a lower price than it charges independent merchants who buy the other 75 percent of that output.

Congressman PATMAN, using the chain-store propagandists' own figures, aptly cited that, if chain stores, doing 25 percent of the retail business in this country, can save American consumers $750,000,000 a year, then independent merchants, who do the other 75 percent of the Nation's retail business, can save the American consumer two and a quarter billion dollars a year when they receive the same price that the chain stores now receive through cheating rebates and chiseling subsidies.

The chain-store lobby is trying to tell you that a bill to require fair dealing will hurt the consumer. They might as well tell you that your electric-light rates would be lower if one vast utility combine controlled all the light plants in America. They might as well tell you that you would pay less for canned goods if one New York multimillionaire controlled all of the canning plants in America.

The Robinson-Patman bill protects the independent businessman and promotes individualism, and guarantees equality of opportunity, and encourages local ownership and control of business because it prevents monopoly. It operates the same as does any other antitrust act, and prohibits rebating and knocking off of millions of dollars to favorite merchandising combines, that must only be charged on to the bill of the less-favored merchant and unprotected retailer.

In 1 year one grocery chain-store corporation is reported to have received $8,000,000 in secret and confidential rebates, discounts, advertising allowances, and brokerage. Over half its net profits were obtained in advance by the rebate and discount methods of buying.

In 1930 this Wall Street chain store operated over 15,000 stores—an average of 5 stores per county for each of the 3,000 counties of the 48 States. It did a business that year of over $1,000,000,000—nearly 10 percent of the national food business of the United States. If that isn't approaching monopoly, I do not know a monopoly when I see it.

A special report of the United States retail census, a part of the census of American business, presents an analysis of the 1,526,119 stores enumerated in 1933 by types of operation, and plainly shows the trend toward monopoly by comparison with the figures for 1929.

The following summary table shows the number of stores and sales, by types of operation, in 1933 as compared with 1929:

Comparison of retail stores, by types of operation

Type	Number of stores		Percent change
	1933	1929

Shown for each type, in addition to the number of stores, are data covering volume sales, the number of proprietors, number of full-time employees, amount of pay roll, average annual earnings of full-time employees, and total reported expense. The latter is exclusive of any compensation or return for the services of proprietors engaged in their own stores, usually in lieu of employees.

In 1933 there were 26,000 fewer independent stores and 6,400 fewer chain stores than in 1929. On the other hand, there were 5,400 more direct-selling (house-to-house) retailers, 40 more mail-order houses, and about 10,000 more stores of other types, including leased departments, cooperatives, etc.

Discrimination against dealers is so extreme that thousands of dealers, we are told, are driven out of business. The strangle hold of these special privileges and sundry species of rebates is so complete that even half the competing manufacturers are driven out of business, and closed factories and closed stores add to the ranks of the unemployed.

I would like to quote a few lines of forgotten logic that were expressed by the Ohio State Supreme Court in its findings in the case of the State ex rel. v. Standard Oil Co. (Ohio, 49–137).

That supreme court said, "A society in which a few men are employers and the great body are merely employees or servants is not the most desirable in a republic, and it should be as much the policy of the law to multiply the numbers engaged in independent pursuits or in the profits of production as to cheapen the price to the consumer.

"Such policy would tend to an equality of fortunes among its citizens, thought to be so desirable in a republic, and lessen the amount of pauperism and crime."

The court then went on to cite that it mattered not how a monopoly be created, whether by patent or "by extensive combinations among those engaged in similar industries controlled by one manager." It added, with judicial foresight, "by the invariable laws of human nature, competition will be excluded and prices controlled in the interests of those connected with the combinations or trusts." Our present chain-store system has set up a series of Nation-wide practices that are as unjust to the independent merchants as they are costly to the public. What would you think of a merchant on the main street of your city or village who attempted such practices to his customers? Here is how it would work. How would you feel toward the merchant in your town if he had one price to the farmer with the 160-acre farm and one hired man and a higher price to 10 farmers with 80-acre farms and no hired men? How would you feel toward the merchant in your town if he had one price to 100 workers with pay checks of $100 a month and a lower price to the worker with a pay check of $200 a month? What would you do with that kind of a merchant?

Let us put it another way—use another homespun illustration. Let us say that four farmers, Olson, Brown, Jones, and Smith come into the back door of this merchant's office early in the harvest season. They show him that they are hiring lots of men for the harvest, as they are the biggest farmers in the neighborhood. They make a little proposition. They say to the retailer, "We are your biggest customers. We will buy more groceries than any other 20 men in the neighborhood. If you make us the right kind of terms, we will buy all of our groceries from you for the fall and winter. But we will do a lot of talking to our neighbors and tell them what good groceries you have, so you figure out the best price and then knock off 10 percent additional from that price for the advertising we will give you, and we will close the deal."

Suppose this retail storekeeper sold all of these large orders for groceries at cost, less 10 percent for advertising, to Olson, Brown, Jones, and Smith. The retailer would have four large orders assured him every week for the fall and winter months. He would also have a lot of conversational advertising, but he would have no profit. So what would this storekeeper do then?

He would go into his private office and figure out just how much he was losing below what return he would have had if he had charged his regular margin of profit and overhead.

Then he would apportion that loss out according to the remainder of his probable business turn-over, spread it onto all of his other customers during the coming season. He would figure out just how much he would have to add to the price of the goods on his counter, the goods he was going to sell to the hundreds of men and women in your community, who were not favored members of the inner circle of the four wealthier farmers.

As soon as the merchant had this figured out you would see him go out to the store window and start changing the price tags in that window and the price tags on the shelves behind the counter. You know, as well as I do, that the change in those price tags would be upward, not downward.

You, my friends, would be paying throughout the fall and winter for the special privileges of Olson, Brown, Jones, and Smith.

When the Robinson-Patman bill seeks to prevent monopoly and prohibit special privilege and secret rebates, it is only protecting the consumer, the farmer, and the wage earner. It is only forcing all retail distributors to meet on an open and aboveboard basis of keen and honest competition where the same premium for efficiency and distribution will prevail.

Maybe the old-fashioned butcher boy used to weigh his thumb occasionally, but under the present system you, the public, are paying for weighing all the big thumbs in Wall Street.

The Department of Commerce has issued a report showing that on all purchases from chain stores in four large cities, more than 50 percent of the items sold were short in weight. This was far more than the short weight charged against independents. Seventy-six of the one hundred and twenty grocery manufacturers in this country admitted being forced to give some sort of unfair, preferential treatment to chain buyers, and 23 of them admitted that they were clubbed into the bargain they made.

Don't forget that today a lot of men who were prosperous merchants on our main street a few years ago, are now numbered among the 13,000,000 unemployed in this country. That is their thanks for helping to found and build pioneer towns.

Do not let the chain-store millions and their newspaper propaganda convince you that the mulcting, cheating tactics of the chain stores today are any benefit to the people of America. They are only silky words and distorted figures, attempting to prove to you that paying crooked bonuses from a corkscrew system is a benefit to the man who produces the stuff they sell and the man who pays his wages for it over the counter.

The chain-store lobby has tried to convince you that the chain stores pay higher wages to their employees than do the independent merchants. That too is untrue. An investigation made by the Federal Trade Commission for the United States Senate shows that 1,200 chains, operating 65,000 stores throughout this country, and employing nearly 300,000 people, paid an average wage of less than $21.50 a week. The average wage of independent-store employees was $28.50 a week.

The chain-store lobby does not tell you that the clerks and managers of most of the chain stores throughout the country have to pay, out of their salaries, for every wormy cabbage and every rabbit-bitten carrot, that the customer brings back. That is how the chain-store tactics affect labor.

Out of 26 tobacco manufacturers interviewed, 16 admitted they were clubbed into price preference by means of extra discounts, rebates, and other allowances. How did they make up this loss? By adding to the price they charge to the merchants who sell 75 percent of their output.

The chain stores club down the price they pay to the producers just as they club down the price they pay to the manufacturers. The manufacturer can add it on to the price he charges the independent merchants. But the producer who brings his butter or berries or vegetables to market comes without a club in his hand.

In the hearings, conducted by Congressman PATMAN in the House, a common practice in the berry-growing district was exposed. The first farmer in with six cases of berries on a morning when berries were selling for $3 a crate, received $3 a crate for his berries from the chain-store manager. The chain-store manager opened a crate and put 24 boxes in the widow with price cards on them at 10 cents a box.

As the sun came up other farmers arrived with their loads of berries. Berries were selling that day at $3 a crate. The chain-store manager would point to the window and say, "Why I am retailing at 10 cents a box or $2.40 a crate." Through these tactics he would force down the price to the farmers so that he would only pay $2 a crate, and then, after the morning's buying was over, the figure on the price card on the little boxes in the window would go up again. That is how the chain-store practices affect the producer.

But here is where the downright bribery comes in—and don't forget that when bribery is a common practice in business dealing, sooner or later you, the consumers, pay the cost.

The testimony in the recent American Safety Razor case of the Federal Trade Commission shows that in addition to a 10-percent special advertising allowance given chain drug and cigar stores, American Safety Razor Corporation sold the United Cigar Stores 20,000 shares of treasury common stock at the price of $47.50 per share, when at that time the market price of that stock on the New York Stock Exchange was $70 or more per share. Thus the American Safety Razor Corporation virtually handed to the United Cigar Stores $450,000 in cash as consideration for buying its product. There are no decisions at the present time which will serve as authority or precedent for the Commission to prevent such deals. The Robinson-Patman bill aims to correct just this situation.

If those who control the great purchasing power can continue unfairly to force rebates, allowances, discounts that have to be made up in charges to other customers, then what happens? Their competitors are forced out of business. Their own purchasing power is increased, and the grip of monopoly is tied about the throats of both the producers and consumers of America.

Let the large units of trade drive the small units out of existence, and then what? Complete monopoly with both producer and consumer at the mercy of that monopoly. For lack of competition the farmer then must sell at prices fixed by that monopoly or let his produce rot. For lack of competition the worker must buy at prices fixed by that monopoly or go hungry and cold. That, my friends, is price fixing.

The Robinson-Patman bill does not fix prices, but let the trend to monopoly continue and monopoly will fix prices.

Out in my own home State of Minnesota no more than 2 years ago, hundreds of our independent merchants became fearful when my party advocated a program of which this bill is a part.

Today those merchants look for their salvation to this measure * * * to its harnessing of monopoly * * * to its prohibition of avaricious special privilege, and its unscrupulous mulcting of the unprotected and unorganized. Today those merchants have learned who are their friends. They have learned that they cannot get a hearing in the great reactionary newspapers that defamed and vilified my party and the State administration that had striven to help them.

They have learned that those daily newspapers are published not for service but for profit. They have learned that those newspapers squeeze their fat profit out of advertising. They have learned that the fattest of those advertising profits come from the great banker-controlled chain stores. They have learned that the newspapers print what the monopolies want them to print and leave out what the monopolies want them to leave out.

What have you read in your daily newspapers about this fight for life of the independent merchants? I do not mean editorials. It would be too much to expect these profit-inspired and chain-store-dictated newspapers to set clever young men of their editorial writing staffs to work arguing for a bill that would rip the cheating privileges out of the hands of the rich monopolies.

I am not talking about editorials, I am talking about the news columns of those newspapers.

What do you read, even in the news columns, about this fight for life of the independent merchants?

Just a few weeks ago you had the perfect illustration of what I mean. Right here in Washington the independent merchants of America, the small businessmen of the Nation's large and small main streets, gathered for the biggest day of their organizational history. Every State in the Union was represented. The officials and duly chosen representatives of virtually every independent retail merchandizing group in the country participated. There were the retail druggists, the retail grocers, the retail fruit and vegetable dealers, the retail clothiers and hardware men, and tire sellers. They were the men and women who came from the sidewalks of our cities and from the corner stores and main streets of our towns and villages and from the farming communities. They came to organize to save themselves, their stores, towns, and communities, which they had helped to build, from chain-store extermination.

They came to Washington for what they termed their first national "independents day." They held their epoch-making Nation-wide conclave in historic Constitution Hall.

But what happened? Even the Washington dailies all but ignored their huge convention. And did any of the hundreds of newspapers throughout America send their army of Washington correspondents over to Constitution Hall to cover the convention?

If they did, I would like to know which one it was. I am sure that paper is not published in Minnesota. Why, the few straggling reporters that were ordered to run over to that great convention for a few moments and "look in on it" wandered about Constitution Hall with their faces pulled by that expression of utter desolation and disgust that marks a newspaperman's face only when he is sent to cover a story that he knows will never get in the paper.

Those delegates at Constitution Hall celebrating their "independents day" represented 1,500,000 independent merchants of America. Together with their employees and their families dependent upon them, they represented about 12,000,000 Americans.

On their platform program they had a half dozen distinguished speakers, any one of whom would have drawn a crowd of many thousands of listeners at any State fair in America.

But those speakers and those independent merchants talked in plain language about some delicate and startling subjects. They talked about secret rebates, and special discounts, and advertising allowances, and some of the other discriminations practiced and permitted to be practiced by the chain-store combines of this country. They talked about the Robinson-Patman bill that would cure those evils, stop those practices, and give the independents not one iota of advantage, but an even footing with the chains. They talked about a bill that would try to make the chain-store overlords as clean as they are clever, as honest as they are omnipotent, and as equitable as they are efficient.

So, my friends, they didn't get their doings put in the newspapers. If you do not think that chain-store practices have become recognized as an evil let me tell you that 26 of the 48 States, fearful of the loopholes that now lurk in our Federal law, have tried to establish fair-trade laws. Seventeen States have established chain-store tax laws and 19 others have tried to establish them.

The Robinson-Patman bill is not a tax bill. It does not levy a penny of tax nor a penny of penalty. It is a protective measure. It is a plug for the loophole of crooked merchandising, a loophole that only time and experience and our changed social and economic order has shown to exist in the present Clayton antitrust laws. It does prevent discrimination in prices where such discrimination does tend to create monopoly. That was the purpose of the Clayton Act, which this Robinson-Patman bill seeks to amend, and the Clayton Act is now 22 years old.

Most of the trick pamphlets and phoney arguments and misleading literature that has been scattered to the four winds of the country by the chain-store lobby holds up, to your horror and amazement, distorted versions of the language of the Robinson-Patman bill. Most of that language and those phrases with which they attempt to frighten you are the same language and the same phrases that for 22 years have been in the Clayton Antitrust Act.

It does not prevent discounts for advertising, provided the same discounts for advertising are allowed to little purchasers in the proportion to the goods they buy and the advertising they do.

A manufacturer can manufacture an entire year's output and sell it at a loss if he wants to, provided he takes the same loss on sales to the independent distributor that he takes in his sales to the chain-store and mail-order distributors.

And, finally, let me say the Robinson-Patman bill is not merely an anti-chain-store bill. The bill does not in any way attempt to change the business methods or practices within the chain-store systems, whether those practices be good or bad. It does not put any penalty on efficiency, either in manufacturing or distribution. It makes no differentiation between prices charged, just so the prices are equal on a corresponding quantity to every purchaser. It does not prevent the distributor or retailer, whether he be chain or independent, from passing along to the consumer every saving that efficiency can devise. It does not prevent quantity discounts. It does not fix prices. It does not prohibit anything except practices that destroy competition and bring about monopolies. The Robinson-Patman bill cannot injure any legitimate business or legitimate practices.

The opponents of this bill are those who bribe their favorite customers at the expense of the rank and file of their customers. They talk about the Robinson-Patman bill destroying equality of opportunity for young people. No agency in the American system of distribution has been any more destructive of opportunity for youth than the chain banks and chain enterprises who seek to regiment and standardize clerkships, counter salesmen, auditors, and store managers into a vast army of mediocre trade slaves, living on starvation wages, devoid of every iota of originality or independence.

If you believe that competition is the life of trade; if you believe in the policy of live and let live; if you believe it is the duty of government to protect the weak against the cheating and bribing of the strong; if you believe that all of the consumers in America should have a right to buy their goods in fair and open markets of trade; if you believe that the farmers' market gardeners and dairymen of the community should have a right to sell their products to their friends and neighbors and storekeepers who have helped them build their communities and towns, then you are an advocate of the Robinson-Patman bill.

I was born and lived all but a few years of my life in a small community in southwestern Minnesota. I have seen these independent merchants take the role of leadership in every movement for the betterment of that community.

These merchants and the townspeople and farmers for miles around worked hand in hand to build that community into a thriving town. These merchants and townspeople and farmers were friends and neighbors. They shared the good years and the bad; they contributed to community funds for harvest festivals and Fourth of July celebrations. They supported the churches and schools and public improvements. Whether they met at church or at the ballot box on election day, or at an auction sale, they were friends, and they shared their pride in the community. I do not want to see those 1,500,000 independent merchants exterminated by chain-store monopolies.

I do not want to see the 12,000,000 people who are dependent on them sacrificed on the block of discriminatory trade practices that any common man would just call cheating.

COMPENSATION OF DIVISION SUPERINTENDENTS AND OTHERS IN THE RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 10267) to provide for adjusting the compensation of division superintendents, assistant division superintendents, assistant superintendents at large, assistant superintendent in charge of car construction, chief clerks, assistant chief clerks, and clerks in charge of sections in offices of division superintendents in the Railway Mail Service, to correspond to the rates established by the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, with a Senate amendment, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, lines 3 and 4, strike out "with the concurrence of the Civil Service Commission."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. BURCH, HILDEBRANDT, ROBERTSON, DOUTRICH, and GOODWIN.

HOURS OF DUTY OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 10193) to amend the act to fix the hours of duty of postal employees, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Line 9, strike out "weekly."

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman explain what changes have been made in this bill by the Senate?

Mr. MEAD. The House bill designated these employees as weekly employees. The Senate struck out the word "weekly" and inserted "per diem." The department informs us the Senate amendment will in no way injure the administration of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. There are no weekly Democrats, either?

Mr. MEAD. No. It affects only 192 employees in the Mail Equipment Shop, mostly women. To identify them particularly we classified them as weekly workers. They are per diem workers. The Senate thought it was unnecessary to classify them as weekly workers.

Mr. RICH. In other words, you are cutting down the hours of labor from 44 to 40 and increasing the wages 10 percent.

Mr. MEAD. We did that in the 40-hour week bill, but this additional legislation was made necessary by a decision of the Comptroller of the Currency excluding this group from the operations of that bill.

Mr. RICH. The lowest pay any of them receive is $4.40 per day. You increase them 10 percent. The highest pay any of them receive is $12.60 a day and you increase them by 10 percent, too.

Mr. MEAD. And many of them have been borrowing money to live on since they suffered this cut.

Mr. RICH. There are lots of people in the gentleman's district and in my district borrowing money to live on, and they do not get as high wages as these people get without the increase.

Mr. MEAD. They do not have to pay the high rents we pay here in the District.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. STACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, May 1, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table I may address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes tomorrow after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I would like to know from the majority leader what the program is going to be for tomorrow.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, we are about to begin the consideration of the appropriation bill for the Navy Department, and I hope, therefore, that no other request will be made which will delay the consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania is going to rip up the Kelly machine that tried to defeat him and could not?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I think it proper for me to make a statement, because it may give some information to Members who may be making plans for the remainder of the week. A situation has developed in the House where we think it very important that we finish the Navy appropriation bill as speedily as possible. I want to therefore give notice that it is the expectation to finish the Navy appropriation bill this week. I regret to announce that we expect to finish this bill by Saturday night. This is the first time during the session we have kept the Members here on Saturday, but we have reached the stage in our proceedings where it is necessary.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman inform the House what it is expected to take up the first of next week?

Mr. BANKHEAD. For the present, unless some change in the program develops, Monday and Tuesday are regular calendar days. We hope to have the deficiency bill, the so-called relief bill, ready for consideration on Wednesday. It is our expectation to take that matter up next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOILEAU. I am advised by the Clerk that 218 Members have signed the petition to discharge the Rules Committee from further consideration of the resolution bringing up the Frazier-Lemke bill for consideration on the floor. May I ask the Speaker whether or not the petition is now completed and the matter on the calendar?

The SPEAKER. The motion is now on the calendar under the rules of the House.

Mr. BOILEAU. That is all I wanted to know.

MARINE CASUALTY INVESTIGATION BOARD

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I wish to renew my previous request. The gentleman who interposed the objection has withdrawn his objection.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 8599) to provide for a change in the designation of the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection, to create a marine casualty investigation board, and increase efficiency in administration of the steamboat-inspection laws, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. BLAND, Mr. SIROVICH, Mr. RAMSPECK, Mr. LEHLBACH, and Mr. WELCH.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL, 1937

Mr. UMSTEAD, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 12527) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 2548), which was read the first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12527) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes; and pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill may continue for the remainder of the day, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12527, with Mr. VINSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, it is with profound regret that I announce the illness of the chairman of the Subcommittee on Naval Appropriations, the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARY], who has for several months devoted a great deal of time and effort to the consideration of this bill. I deeply regret he is not able to be with us today and to have charge of the bill. However, he has prepared a statement in connection with this measure, and at this time, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARY], chairman of the subcommittee, may be inserted in the RECORD at this point in the same type print in which it would appear if the gentleman had delivered the speech on the floor of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Congress, it becomes my duty at this time to present to you for your consideration the naval appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1937. Unfortunately and unavoidably this bill carries the largest appropriation of any annual naval supply measure ever presented to the Congress predicated upon estimates prepared in time of peace. This is to be regretted. You know and I know that every dollar spent for the habiliments of war is a wanton waste and an indictment against the civilization of the world.

The peoples of the earth seem to be straying far from the teachings of the Prince of Peace when he gave to the world the doctrine of "Peace on earth, good will toward men."

Americans are a peace-loving people. We are opposed to war, and have led the way for disarmament and peace of the world. Our teachings and examples have not been followed, and we are compelled to build a national defense at great cost. The disturbed condition of the world today is appalling. More men are under arms than at any time since the World War. The nations of Europe are facing relations more strained possibly than have ever before prevailed. It is fearful to think of what may happen in the near future.

Notwithstanding, we, as a people, have confidence in the ultimate triumph of sane, sensible, peaceful methods of settling differences between nations, yet in the present troubled state of the world we realize that armament cannot be dispensed with. The national-defense program of the present administration is absolutely necessary and far-sighted. It is for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of securing our peace, maintaining our security, and of deterring aggression.

I believe it is the duty of this Congress to build up our armed forces on land, in the air, and at sea commensurate with our needs to insure our national security—that is the aim of the present program.

We have not abandoned disarmament as the key to universal peace. I earnestly hope that we may continue to lead the way for the peace of the world and that the dream of disarmament may become a reality. If this can be done, the huge expenditures for armament may then cease and the greatest burden to humanity lifted and happiness brought to the people of all the earth.

Mr. Chairman, on November 12, 1921, the eyes of the world were focused upon this great city of Washington. An epochal event was about to transpire.

Here on that date were met leading statesmen and high-ranking naval officials of our own and foreign Governments for the express purpose of endeavoring by treaty to stop a race in naval armaments. We, with most of the other nations who took part in that meeting, were fresh from the great catastrophe of war. There was an earnest desire at that time by all the participants to bring about a treaty that would forever stop a mad race in world armament. It was a movement initiated by the Government of the United States, pursuant, I think it, but fair to say, to a provision carried in the Naval Appropriation Act approved July 12, 1921, whereby the Congress authorized and requested the President of the United States to take appropriate steps to bring about such a conference. This Government was interested at that time, as it has been ever since, in trying to show the nations of the earth the absolute folly of war and the preparation for war.

Our aims and our hopes, it seems to me, could not have been better expressed than by President Harding, who during the course of his address to the assembled delegates used these words:

> Out of the cataclysm of the World War came new fellowships, new convictions, new aspirations. It is ours to make the most of them. A world staggering with debt needs its burden lifted. Humanity which has been shocked by wanton destruction would minimize the agencies of that destruction. Contemplating the measureless cost of war and the continuing burden of armament, all thoughtful peoples wish for real limitation of armament and would like war outlawed. In soberest reflection the world's hundreds of millions who pay in peace and die in war wish our statesmen to turn the expenditures for destruction into means of construction aimed at a higher state for those who live and follow after.

Today, but little more than 14 years later, we seem to be upon the threshold of having those hopes and those aspirations, which offered so much in the promotion of international accord and good will, tossed aside despite all the ugly potential consequences with which all nations are fully familiar.

Ambition and greed, engendering fear, suspicion, and distrust, apparently remain entrenched—not only entrenched, but seemingly have gained a position of dominance. When these sinister obstacles to human progress and happiness dominate the policy of nations, the oppressive cost of war preparation becomes a secondary consideration. This undoubtedly is true with the nations of Europe at the present time. Insatiable avarice stops at nothing, not even war, with its appalling toll of human lives, its measureless cost, and the sorrow, misery, and distress which follow in its wake.

Because, my friends, suspicion and international distrust have been revived, or, possibly, have continued to survive, this bill we present to you today may mark another epoch, at least so far as our own Navy is concerned. It appears now likely that it will be the last measure to be written consecutively and completely within the circumscribing terms of an international agreement.

A lack of international accord or the lack of agreement such as we have had is not reflected in this measure. As to future measures, we must await upon the course of other powers. America will not lead in a naval race, but I do not entertain the slightest doubt that the American people are predominantly in favor of and will insist upon a navy second to none and one which at all times actually will observe the ratios established by the Washington Treaty of 1922.

Our existing policy is founded upon the Washington and London treaties. They will cease to be operative after the end of this calendar year. This bill is another step toward the attainment by 1942 of the maximum strength we are permitted to have under those agreements, all in under-age tonnage save capital ships. We are submitting a recommendation with respect to capital ships which I shall refer to later.

The size of this measure, I realize, is exceedingly disturbing to some people. Mr. Chairman, it is disturbing to me, and if anybody can show me wherein it may be appreciably reduced without in anywise doing harm to the sort of establishment we are endeavoring to build up I shall be most happy to have them come forward and do so. I am about persuaded that it just cannot be done.

When we consider these national-defense measures we should do well to remember Cromwell's oft-repeated admonition to his troops who were about to ford a swollen stream. Said Cromwell: "Put your trust in God, but be sure to keep your powder dry." To be prepared, my friends, in other words, for no one can forecast what might happen or when or in what quarter. The world is now in the midst of a swirling stream. Whether the dikes will hold or whether there will be a break here of there or all along the line God only knows.

Statesmen advised by naval experts not of our own Government alone but of the Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan established and did agree to the principle that our Navy should be the equal of any other navy in the world, and that as to Japan the ratio should be as 5 is to 3. Certainly it is not unreasonable to seek to attain and maintain such a degree of preparation, particularly when we see cotreaty powers building up to the maximum fleets thus permitted. It would be unreasonable not to do so.

Any Member on this floor who has selected and sent to our Naval Academy the sons of persons who are in part responsible for that Member being here owes it to those boys and to the parents of those boys and to the communities from which they were chosen that they are not placed in a position where, if called upon tc engage in battle in defense of America, they will be handicapped because, forsooth, that Member's naval interest, his interest in national defense, ceased with the exercise of that bit of patronage.

Where is your patriotism? It was John C. Calhoun who said that "protection and patriotism are reciprocal." You cannot profess to one and ignore the other. They go hand in hand and are inseparable.

When the Army bill was on the floor here I heard it suggested that the military part of it should be cut between a third and a fourth, that the money thus freed might be used to feed the hungry. That struck me as plain, unadulterated demagogy. Whether you believe in national defense or not, it is a fact that 85 percent of the money carried in this bill, not earmarked or allocated to pay, will be expended either directly or indirectly for personal services, and the same was true of the Army bill.

Those of us who, by reason of our committee assignments, are directly charged with dealing with national defense preparation frequently are asked against whom we are preparing, or, if we are not looking to a war of aggression, why need we further build up the existing establishments, or rather why should we not reduce them.

My answer to them is that America is not making preparation for war against any power, and America will never engage in a war of aggression, but, as Lord Byron once said, "The best prophet of the future is the past." We do not know, we cannot know, what tomorrow may bring forth, and I, for one, am unwilling to gamble with the security of this priceless heritage we have from our forefathers—these United States of America. However, I am not so national-defense minded, Mr. Chairman, that I am willing to underwrite every request for funds that may be presented. There is a phase to the stupendous expenditures that have been and are being made in the name of relief that to all persons who have a responsibility in connection with Federal budgeting is extremely disturbing. Not unlike the effect of the large war budgets, the recent availability of such vast sums for fighting the depression has led to a disregard of sound budgeting. It has created a sort of fiscal psychology in both the legislative and executive branches of our Government which will take years completely to dissipate, but it must be dissipated if we ever are to bring expenditures within proper bounds. Now, I am a bit suspicious that our Navy friends have a touch of this easy-money mania. We are aiming to have a treaty Navy by the end of the fiscal year 1941. We have been told that such a Navy, upon attainment, will cost us $555,000,000 annually to maintain and operate, including the construction cost of replacement vessels and aircraft. I propose, and I hope you will join me, to keep that figure as the very maximum so long as we are not compelled to go beyond the size and kind of navy which that figure contemplates. I am inclined to believe that we can come well inside of it, and I certainly do not propose to let appropriations approach that maximum ahead of time.

In the consideration of the bill we are now presenting, with that figure of $555,000,000 having been supplied to us by the Chief of Naval Operations scarcely more than a year ago, we met with propositions which showed a disregard for such an ultimate maximum, and we have made reductions in this bill because of that fact. I wish to say to those of you who are opposed to large naval expenditures and to those of you who stand for a treaty navy, but who keep a weather eye on the cost, that you should keep this maximum figure in mind, and make inquiry as to all legislation proposed, whether or not it occasions an increase in any of the items contributing to the $555,000,000. All legislative proposals originating in the executive branch, to get by the Budget, must be found not to be in conflict with the administration's fiscal program. I suggest that we might very well adopt a similar policy and demand to know as to each piece of naval legislation presented here whether or not, if it should become law, it would mean adding to the cost of any of the component parts of the $555,000,000.

If you will look at the analysis of the large increase carried in the Budget over the current appropriations which I have made for you on page 2 of the report, you will see that a very large portion of it is responsive to recent legislation which it would not be possible to effectuate without adding materially to the cost of the Navy, both as regards matériel and personnel. This legislation we cannot view as a mere gesture. It becomes, when enacted, the last expression of the position of the Congress upon the matters to which it relates, and the Appropriations Committee cannot, as I see it, do more than see that appropriations asked to make it effective are no greater than necessary consistent with good business policy. So it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, when we bring bills in here and have them attacked because of their magnitude, it is very much like locking the barn door after the horse has gotten away.

The Budget increase of $60,315,324—net—is considerably more than accounted for by four propositions.

For the current fiscal year the appropriations were made looking to an enlisted force of 93,500 men by the end of the year. The average number we appropriated for was 88,000. For 1937 the Budget looks to closing the year with 100,000 enlisted men, the expansion to be so regulated, however, that the average number for the year will be 96,500. We therefore are called upon to appropriate for the full year for an additional 8,500 men, and the cost will be $10,527,114. During 1937 the number of vessels that will be in commission will increase from an average of 312.3 to 319.6. The number of operating airplanes are estimated to advance from 958 to 1,259. These factors, in conjunction with the policy not to have less than 85 percent of complement in any type of vessel, are responsible for this present request further to expand the enlisted strength.

The authorized enlisted strength of the Marine Corps is 20 percent of the authorized enlisted strength of the Navy, which is 137,485 men. That would make the authorized enlisted strength of the Marine Corps roundly 27,500. The enlisted strength of the Marine Corps, as you all know, has been held down by appropriations. For the present year the number is 16,000. For 1937 it is proposed that the number shall be gradually increased to 17,000, and we are asked to provide for the cost for the full year of one-half of the increase, or 500, which means an added expense of $429,904. The increase in the enlisted strength of the Marine Corps is required mainly to augment the Fleet Marine Force, which has an approved strength of 7,500 and an actual strength of 2,805, both figures being exclusive of aviation personnel. There is an additional demand, also, to supply marine complements for additional vessels that will be in commission.

Then, aside from enlisted men, it appeared necessary when the Budget was shaped to add another appointment to the Naval Academy, raising the number to five, which is the full number authorized by law. The need for this additional appointment was urged as essential to bring the line officer strength up to 6,531 by 1945. The number of line officers on September 30 last was 6,165. Four appointments are estimated to yield 521 graduates and five appointments 625. The number available for commissioning, however, runs about 84 percent, due largely to Staff Corps and Marine Corps demands. This annual yield, of course, is considerably offset by normal attrition, which, under present law, will assume larger proportions by reason of the extension of selection to encompass all grades from junior lieutenant to captain, both inclusive. In addition there are somewhere in the neighborhood of 500 over-age lieutenants and lieutenants (junior grade), who become extra numbers on July 1 next and will be retired when their commissioned service shall have amounted to 21 years and 14 years, respectively, which will occur between 1939 and 1941.

The cost of this proposal for 1937 was represented to be $589,937, exclusive of $147,000 under Public Works for additional dormitory space, to cost $750,000.

Very recently, and after the conclusion of the committee's hearings, the Department concluded to recommend a modification of the laws governing the selection and elimination of officers in the junior grades, and, if such a change be made, four appointments, in conjunction with other appointments authorized by law, will provide a flow of graduates adequate to meet all now apparent demands. Being thus advised, the committee has prepared this bill on the four-appointment basis, and, by so doing, has been able to make a reduction of $441,609. A portion of the Budget increase has not been disturbed because it appears that there will be a larger number of midshipmen at the Academy next year under the four-appointment arrangement than originally estimated.

These three personnel propositions which I have just discussed occasion an addition in the Budget over the current year of $12,068,755.

The fourth proposition, and the proposition which accounts for more than 80 percent of the net Budget increase of $60,000,000 plus, pertains to the shipbuilding program. The increase asked in the Budget is $49,595,000. I shall speak of that later when I speak of some of the reductions the committee has effected.

These four matters, Mr. Chairman, three involving personnel and one matériel, more than account for the net Budget increase. The other items, as I have already said, are itemized for you in our report, divided between personnel and matériel. They are offset by the considerably lesser amount we are asked to appropriate for public works.

I shall turn now to our committee action.

I have had the finest kind of cooperation from my committee colleagues, and we have worked out a bill which I should hesitate further to reduce in any direction for maintaining, supporting, or operating an establishment of the proportions to which we are committed. We have made a gross reduction of $23,805,119 and a net reduction of $18,522,592. You will find that all detailed in a table commencing on page 4 of the report. To be perfectly frank about it, however, as I have stated in the report, $15,000,000 of the reduction we have made definitely is a deferment, and, of the remainder, $1,722,950 may or may not be a permanent saving, depending upon food and fuel price trends.

It is not my purpose to discuss in great detail the changes we have made. The report possibly should suffice, but, with your indulgence, I shall take sufficient time to call attention to the most pronounced items.

NAVAL RESERVES

We have reduced the Naval Reserve estimate by $921,531. The estimates for this component came to us in the total figure of $8,790,000, which is a net increase over the current year of $1,437,175. I shall enumerate for you the principal items in that figure for which we have declined to recommend appropriations.

For giving 14 days' training duty to officers and men of the merchant marine. That would cost $226,798.

For bringing interior divisions to salt water for training instead of training them on the ships assigned to the Reserve on the Great Lakes. That would cost $44,632.

For giving a greater number of officers and enlisted men of the volunteer branch of the Reserve 14 days' training duty. That would cost $427,448.

For embarking on a new plan to give 45 days' training duty to 1,000 college students. That would cost initially $138,000.

This last proposition is an improvisation for an extension of the Naval R. O. T. C. law, which has a statutory limit of 1,200 trainees, 200 of whom are supposed to be allocated to the Marine Corps, but all appropriated by the Navy. The Congress having enacted legislation to provide the Navy with Reserve officers through the medium of R. O. T. C. schools, the committee has taken the position that if a need exists to expand that law, legislation should be sought, and that there should not be resort to the indirect way here proposed.

ORDNANCE

You will notice a sizable reduction we are proposing under the Ordnance Department. The Budget includes $2,372,000 for ordnance for the 1937 airplane procurements. We ascertained that 113 of those airplanes are not expected to be delivered prior to July 1, 1937, and the cost to supply the ordnance for those particular 113 planes is estimated to cost $1,205,933. Therefore, we have subtracted that amount from the estimate. There is no occasion to appropriate the money in advance of the fiscal year in which it will be expended.

The other reduction we have made is more or less arbitrary. I do not like arbitrary reductions and as a rule I am not disposed to resort to them, but we increased the current appropriation over the appropriation for 1935 by $11,154,400, and we just concluded that we would not recommend a further increase at this time. The current increase was occasioned by a number of projects, some new and of a confidential character, and others were made for projects which had been pinched by reason of inadequate prior appropriations.

The ordnance situation of the Navy, as a whole, is in a very satisfactory state, owing largely to the liberal policy the Congress has pursued in making provision for spares and reserves for new ships, the cost being lodged against ordnance funds for new ship construction.

PAY, SUBSISTENCE, AND TRANSPORTATION, NAVAL PERSONNEL

We have effected a number of reductions in the appropriations for pay, subsistence, and transportation of naval personnel, amounting, in the aggregate to $1,757,019. I shall merely mention the larger ones. Continuing the four-appointment arrangement to Annapolis, to which I have previously referred, accounts for $222,792 of it. We found the estimate for pay of enlisted men based upon a distribution in pay grade at variance with the distribution we were told a year ago had been employed in arriving at the whole annual cost of maintaining a Navy of full treaty proportions. Computing the present estimate on such a basis, and I know of no reason why we should not, yields a saving of $949,103.

Under the subsistence head we have made a reduction of $356,529, which may or may not prove to be a permanent saving. The estimate is based upon a ration cost of 47 cents. For the period July to September 1935, the ration actually cost 45.902 cents. We have employed that figure. If the cost goes up a deficiency appropriation will be in order because the components of the ration are fixed by law. Moreover, there is no disposition on anyone's part, I am sure, to economize at the expense of the soldier's or sailor's table.

The third and only other major reduction we have made under this personnel item of appropriation applies to transportation. The Budget allows an increase of $593,237, and we have cut that amount by $213,600, and here again arbitrarily, in a measure, at least, although in part justified by the pending reduction in rail and Pullman rates made subsequently to the submission of the Budget.

FUEL AND TRANSPORTATION

The bulk of the appropriation for fuel and transportation is expended for fuel oil. The estimate for 1937 is $9,800,000, which looks to the consumption of a greater quantity of fuel oil by 193,264 barrels, and an average price of 95 cents per barrel. Recent bids, however, show a marked downward trend for oil delivered on the west coast, on the strength of which the estimate has been recalculated, using an average price of 78.75 cents per barrel, which admits of a reduction of $1,312,540.

PUBLIC WORKS

For the current fiscal year $18,399,000 has been appropriated directly for naval public works. That figure includes $16,924,000 appropriated in the Second Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1935. For 1937 the Budget proposes an appropriation of $5,000,000 toward the prosecution of projects estimated to cost $10,986,100, and in addition $260,000, to be charged to the naval hospital fund, for extending the main hospital building at San Diego, Calif.

The committee does not recommend the appropriation at this time of the amounts included in the estimates for the following projects:

Additional dormitory space at the Naval Academy	$147,000
Improvement of interior illumination, Naval Academy	121,500
Improvement of waterfront, naval operating base, Hampton Roads, Va	135,000
Naval model basin in the vicinity of the District of Columbia	1,831,200

The first item I have explained before. The next two items are in the desirable but not immediately necessary category. If the first item were of high priority, it would have been urged before this. The total cost of each of these two items is $270,000 and $300,000, respectively.

A bill authorizing the model basin has been passed by the House and Senate and was awaiting the approval of the President when our report was written. Until it becomes law the committee would be without authority to include in an appropriation bill funds for going ahead with the project.

The committee has added to the estimate $125,000 for extending the machine shop at the Norfolk Navy Yard. It is advised that this expenditure will be early repaid through economies resulting from more economical production facilities. It has made an addition of $150,000 for necessary work at the Mare Island Navy Yard preliminary to beginning construction of the graving dock at that establishment, authorized by the act of April 15, 1935, and it has made a draft of $295,000 upon the naval hospital fund, in addition to the $260,000 proposed in the Budget on account of the naval hospital at San Diego, to begin the construction of a new naval hospital in this city, which was authorized by the act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with certain public works at the United States Naval Hospital, Washington, D. C.", approved February 25, 1931.

AVIATION

Taking into account contract authorization under the Budget estimate, there would be available for obligation on account of Navy aviation during 1937, $6,587,690 more than is available for obligation the present fiscal year, the total proposed availability being $45,410,000. This increase divides principally between maintenance, which is increased $2,765,550, and new aircraft, where there is an increase of $3,618,340.

The maintenance item is stepped up very largely by reason of the expansion I have previously mentioned in the number of operating airplanes from 958 to 1,259. There also will be an appreciably heavier charge occasioned by the intensive overhaul program at the naval air station, Pensacola, because of the heavy training program.

The increase for new airplanes results from the planned procurement of a larger number of more expensive types. For the current year the appropriation and contract authorization were designed to procure 555 airplanes for the Regular Navy. It appears now that actual procurements will number 502. The 1937 Budget looks to the procurement of 333 airplanes for the Regular Navy.

At the time of the hearings 331 airplanes of the 502 to be bought for the present year had not been ordered, and there remained to be ordered 355 airplanes under appropriations or contract authorizations made or given prior to the fiscal year 1936. In other words, we ran into about the same situation as did the Army subcommittee headed by the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. PARKS, who told us, if I remember correctly, that 752 airplanes for the Army, provided for as far back as 1933, remained undelivered. I do not see why we should become exercised about a shortage of planes and provide for more than we do when it appears that we are unable to get deliveries without long delays of those for which we do provide.

However, the Navy's plane situation, so far as numbers go, I should say is quite satisfactory. The estimate is that there will be 1,406 airplanes on hand on July 1, 1936. It is apparent from the airplane statement in the hearings, however—page 489—that they do possess too many different makes or models within the several types. This has meant expensive procurement initially through small orders, and it means expensive maintenance because of the variety of spares that must be carried and the diversity of types which repair forces are called upon to handle. This situation has been brought about by two factors, I should say. One, negotiated orders, which are now taboo, and the other the rapid advancement of the art. It does begin to look now, I am happy to say, like we are getting nearer to the point where we will have more planes of the several types of the same make.

The committee has made a reduction of $1,411,730 in the aviation estimate. We have made a lesser allowance by $141,730 for shore maintenance and operation, holding to current-year allocations, except as to Pensacola, where there naturally will be substantially greater activity.

One million dollars of the reduction is merely a switch from cash to contract authorization. Estimated delivery dates of the airplanes for which the estimate provides indicate that, roundly, $1,069,000 of cash will not be needed until after June 30, 1937.

The other item of reduction applies to two nonrigid airships, one to cost $70,000 and the other to cost $200,000. The committee of scientists appointed by the Secretary of the Navy more than a year ago to review and analyze the present situation as to design and construction of airships and to make recommendations as to future design and construction of airships has submitted its report, but the Department has come to no decision thereon. The committee has eliminated those two new nonrigids, believing that any further construction of any type of airship should await upon the policy recommended by the Department and approved by the Congress.

Now, I should like to refer to another matter touching aviation, upon which we are submitting a recommendation to you. The Vinson-Trammell Act carries authority for the construction or manufacture by the Government of airplanes authorized by such act and of the engines therefor. A P. W. A. allotment of $2,708,800 was made to the Navy for extending the facilities of the Naval Aircraft Factory at Philadelphia for the production of program airplanes and engines, the plant being already equipped for and engaged in airplane-overhaul work and equipped for building experimental or special types of airplanes other than engines. The funds allotted will equip the plant for engaging in airplane manufacture on a larger scale, but additional funds will be needed to engage in engine production or building airplanes other than of the training type.

The factory is now engaged in building 85 training planes and it is planned to build 100 engines for such airplanes of a patented design for which a royalty will have to be paid. The Navy has not engaged in building airplane engines. Considering royalty cost, inexperience, and limited production, the chances are that the Government will pay more for the engines than if it purchased them. The last training planes purchased, including engines and all equipment, cost $12,291 each.

To engage in the construction of other than training types of airplanes would necessitate the installation of further equipment and to build an engine of its own design would require the provision of considerable machine-tool equipment. The cost of the more complicated and expensive types of planes would be all out of proportion to the cost of planes commercially produced, because of the limited number that would be produced. For example, the present year, by increasing an order for torpedo bombing planes from 57 to 114, a saving of $800,000 was effected.

The committee believes that the Navy should not go beyond the manufacture of primary training airplanes—the simplest type—and should not engage in airplane-engine manufacture at all. It believes that the Government would save money by pursuing such a course; and, further, that it would save money if it would go out of the airplane-manufacturing business altogether. It should be borne in mind in this connection that private contractors are limited to a 10-percent profit by the Vinson-Trammell Act.

The committee has attached to the bill a limitation barring expenditures upon Government-built airplane engines, other than experimental engines, and Government-built airplanes, other than of the primary training type. So far as such a restriction affecting the work load at the Philadelphia plant is concerned, it was stated to the committee that the policy has been, and will be, to keep employment at the same level whether the factory be engaged upon manufacture or overhaul work. If there be less manufacture there will be less overhaul work sent to other overhaul establishments.

NEW SHIP CONSTRUCTION

Now, I wish to turn to the biggest single item in the bill. For building ships the Budget estimate is $182,500,000. This compares with $132,905,000 made available for the present fiscal year, including a reappropriation of $6,000,000, so we have practically a $50,000,000 increase.

Of the $182,500,000, $168,519,631 is for continuing work on or completing vessels now under construction and $13,980,369 is for beginning the construction of 6 submarines and 12 destroyers.

The portion for vessels now building will be applied to 88 vessels. Expenditures very probably will reach the peak during the ensuing fiscal year. The curve will start downward beginning July 1, 1937, and there will be an appreciable drop on July 1, 1938, irrespective of battleship replacement, which may then be confronting us.

Since the presentation of the Budget there has been concluded another naval conference from which has issued a new naval treaty, signed by the plenipotentiaries of our own Government and the Governments of France and Great Britain on March 25, 1936. The Washington Treaty, signed February 6, 1922, fixed the life of a battleship at 20 years. The London Naval Treaty, signed April 22, 1930, suspended the replacement of battleships during the life of that treaty, which expires December 31, 1936. The new naval treaty provides that a capital ship becomes over-age 26 years after its completion. However, after December 31, 1936, under the new treaty, if ratified, there will be no prohibition upon laying down new capital ships between 17,500 and 35,000 tons, and, if not ratified, no prohibition whatsoever as to ships of any category or character.

Applying the 26-year principle and the further principle of the Washington Treaty permitting the laying down of replacement tonnage 3 years before the vessels they replace become over-age, we have three battleships the replacement of which may be commenced at any time in the calendar year 1937, namely, the Arkansas, which will have been completed 26 years in 1938, and the Texas and New York, which will have been completed 26 years in 1940.

In view of the freedom of action permissible as to battleship replacement after December 31, 1936, and the evident determination of our Government, voiced in the Vinson-Trammel Act of March 27, 1934, and in subsequent legislation, to maintain a navy second to none, the committee feels that the means should be available for matching any battleship construction that may be undertaken by any of the other signatory powers to the London Treaty, signed April 22, 1930, or to the new treaty, signed March 25, 1936. The committee is unwilling to recommend that our Navy Department be given carte blanche to go ahead with the replacement of battleships. Our Government, which has taken the lead in moves to contribute to the maintenance of the general peace and to reduce the burdens of competition in armament, should be the last to take the initiative, but neither should we permit ourselves to become laggards again, as was the case following the Washington Treaty of 1922, so well shown in the table commencing on page 79 of the hearings. Therefore, the committee has made provision in the bill for the commencement of not more than two capital ships, as replacements of over-age capital ships, to be undertaken only in the event that capital-ship replacement construction is commenced by any of the other signatory powers to the treaty for the limitation and reduction of naval armament signed at London, April 22, 1930.

Capital ships of 35,000 tons are estimated to cost upward of $51,000,000 apiece.

In addition to the appropriation requested for 1937, there will be available $33,397,868 of prior year appropriations and an amount upward of $26,000,000 of the N. R. A. allotment of 238,000,000. The total available for expenditure, therefore, will be roundly $242,500,000. The committee has reduced the estimate by $14,000,000, because it feels confident that actual Treasury withdrawals during the period of the fiscal year will not approach such total availability figure by at least the amount of the reduction indicated. If they should, our action would merely delay paying bills maturing on June 30, 1937, until the day following July 1, 1937, the first day of the next succeeding fiscal year.

A reduction of $14,690,000, proposed by the committee in the 1936 bill, was vociferously protested in several quarters, but the present hearings disclose that there will be an unexpended balance at the close of the present fiscal year of roundly $19,000,000 in excess of such amount.

The amount for initiating new construction—that is, $13,980,369—represents the first increment of $113,958,000 for building 6 submarines and 12 destroyers of not over 1,500 tons each. This will leave 23 destroyers and 8 submarines remaining to be initially appropriated for for replacing existing over-age tonnage in those two categories.

We are not allocating any money to the construction of new capital ships. If the construction of one or both is proceeded with, subject to the conditions we have provided, the money will need to be found within the total amount we are recommending for appropriation, which may or may not occasion some slowing down in the progress of work upon other vessels.

I very much deprecate the possibility of our having to engage in battleship construction. I had entertained the hope that there might be a continuation of the building holiday and that ultimately these enormously costly craft might pass out of the picture completely. Of course, it is possible yet that this hope may not be in vain.

STRATEGIC WAR MINERALS

The committee has made one appreciable addition to the Budget estimates. It has to do with the proposition presented last year, which the House approved, to enable the Navy to accumulate a reserve of strategic war minerals. Our esteemed colleague, Representative SCRUGHAM, of Nevada, is an authority on such matters, and I shall leave it to him, in his expert and inimitable way, to justify the item.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, I wish to say a word about the new naval treaty concluded at London on March 25. While I can hardly profess complete surprise at the outcome, I must confess to a measure of disappointment. I had entertained the hope, and I may say that I had some basis for so doing, that irrespective of the unrest and disturbed conditions beyond our shores, a "good neighbor" solution might in the end prevail.

I was struck by this passage in Ambassador Davis' speech, made upon the signing of the treaty:

> I do not believe there is a single provision in this new treaty to which any naval power cannot agree, and it is hoped that all the other Washington treaty powers which are not signing this treaty today will later adhere.

Insofar as I can gather from newspaper accounts from a draft of the proposed treaty itself and from Mr. Davis' speech, I must confess that neither do I see why there should be any objection on the part of any power to subscribing to such a document. I can find little solace in it for those of us who sincerely would like to see a reduction in the cost of armament accomplished through international agreement; more vital and important now, perhaps, than when President Harding used the words in 1921, "A world staggering with debt needs its burden lifted." The only comfort I get out of this latest proposed accord is that it will serve as a bridge, as Mr. Davis says, "to future treaties of more far-reaching scope."

Mr. Chairman, at the proper place in the consideration of this bill, if I could be present, I should offer a way to attempt to cross that bridge. I believe that we ought to see that the door will be open at the first opportune moment for the maritime nations of the world again to gather to work out an agreement that actually will lead to a substantial reduction in our own and foreign naval budgets. I have not much faith in these overseas gatherings, though. There is a sort of atmosphere over there which I fear is not conducive to soberest reflection when it comes to dealing with a problem of this kind.

The amendment I should like to propose would follow very closely—almost to the letter—the provisions of section 9 of the Naval Appropriation Act approved July 12, 1921, and would read as follows:

> That the President of the United States is authorized and requested to invite the Governments of Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, and Japan to send representatives to a conference, which shall be charged with the duty of promptly entering into an understanding or agreement by which the naval expenditures and building programs of each of said Governments, to wit, the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, and Japan, shall be substantially reduced annually during the next 5 years to such an extent and upon such terms as may be agreed upon, which understanding or agreement is to be reported to the respective Governments for approval.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is a man on this floor who would not support such an amendment. I am wholeheartedly in favor of a Navy for America absolutely second to none, but if we can have such a Navy for a third or a half or any fraction less than the cost we are now heading for, we should bend every effort—pursue any honorable course to accomplish that end. We owe it to our own America, we owe it to mankind the world over, not to let this great principle, initiated here in 1921, be defeated by the very influences it was conceived to overcome.

I thank you.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DARDEN].

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not at this time attempt to discuss the measure under consideration. I have requested this opportunity for another purpose.

I want to say a few words about my friend, the late Col. Henry Latrobe Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of the Navy. His work is finished, and while nothing that I may be able to say can add to the respect and esteem held for him by the naval forces of the United States, it is my desire to call his excellent record of service to the attention of the Congress.

Colonel Roosevelt entered the service of the United States in 1896, when he was admitted to the Naval Academy at the age of 17. Three years later he resigned to accept a commission as second lieutenant in the Marine Corps for service in the Spanish-American War.

He was immediately ordered to sea, and on the U. S. S. Newark and later on the U. S. S. Mayflower served off the coast of Cuba.

He was promoted to first lieutenant in 1900, and in 1902 was sent to the Philippines, where he served for 2 years with the marine brigade on duty there. While in the Philippines he was appointed assistant quartermaster, with the rank of captain, and it was in this branch that he continued.

From the Philippines he returned to Washington for duty at headquarters, but his service here was brief. He was soon to go to Panama with an expeditionary battalion on the U. S. S. Columbia, and later during 1906 and 1907 he performed expeditionary duty in Cuba.

In 1908 he was promoted to the rank of major and placed in command of the Marine Corps depot of supplies at San Francisco, where he remained until 1911, when he was again ordered to the Philippines as brigade quartermaster, where he remained until 1914, when he returned to headquarters here for a short time.

Upon the outbreak of the World War he was sent to the American Embassy in Paris for special duty having to do with the relief of American nationals stranded in Europe on account of the hostilities. Upon the completion of this work he again returned to Washington.

Nineteen hundred and sixteen and nineteen hundred and seventeen found him in Haiti, where from April 1916 to May 1917 he was a director in the Haitian Constabulary, with the rank of colonel and inspector general.

When the United States entered the war he was ordered home and sent to Quantico, where as quartermaster of marine barracks he rendered great service in the construction and maintenance of that important post. He was promoted to the rank of lieutenant colonel in 1919 and in 1920 he resigned to enter private business.

On March 17, 1933, he was appointed Assistant Secretary of the Navy, which post he held until he passed away a few weeks ago.

He brought to his work as Assistant Secretary an understanding of naval problems and a deep sympathy with the aims of the service. He was one of them and they loved him. It was my high privilege, as the Representative of a naval district and as a member of the Naval Committee of this body, to see much of him in the course of my work with the Navy Department. I found him generous and ever ready to help. He was intensely interested in improving the naval service in every possible manner.

He faithfully discharged the duties of his office through the most trying times. We are indebted to him for a service which won the respect and admiration of all who knew him. The United States could ill afford to lose him. To his friends the loss is irreparable.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think the membership of the House owes much to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. UMSTEAD], who took charge of this bill as a pinch hitter for his colleague who became ill. The gentleman and his subcommittee have rendered splendid service in handling the measure and I am sure that not only all the members of the Committee on Appropriations, but the entire membership of the House appreciate their services.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss for a few minutes the effects of a bill which we passed in 1923, known as the Reclassification Act. At the time this bill was before the House I then sounded the warning that Congress, by the passage of that act, was giving up its hold on the purse strings of the Treasury so far as the amounts of all salaries are concerned, and this warning has become true, in fact, by reason of the construction and manipulation of that measure. Sooner or later the Congress must repeal that act, and then fix salaries commensurate with the value of the service performed.

I called attention 2 or 3 years ago to the way it affected the Veterans' Administration. While there are some good law schools here, like Georgetown University and George Washington University, a lot of half-baked law colleges sprung up in Washington to grind out periodically a bunch of lawyerettes, who took law merely to increase their salaries under this 1923 Classification Act, and they never will be lawyers. I showed that $1,400 clerks in the Veterans' Administration, by getting a diploma from one of these so-called law colleges here, and getting the status of an attorney, although not prepared to try a case in court and never having been before a court to try a case, and without the knowledge or experience of being able to try a case efficiently, nevertheless became lawyers and automatically, under the act of 1923, their salaries were raised from $1,400 to $2,500, and then to $3,000 and $4,000 and $5,000 and $6,000, eventually, until at the time I checked it up 3 years ago and put their names in the RECORD, with the salaries they used to draw as clerks and the salaries they were then drawing as lawyers in the departments, there were 876 of these so-called lawyers then in the Veterans' Administration alone. I put in the names of several hundred of them who used to be $1,400 and $1,800 clerks, who, after getting their law licenses, drew salaries of $3,000 and $4,000, $5,000 and $6,000 a year apiece as half-baked lawyerettes.

This is the way this 1923 Reclassification Act has been debauched and used to defraud the Government with respect to every department and bureau of the Government. Check them up and in every bureau and in every commission and in every independent office and in every department of government you will find clerks who, through these so-called law colleges here, have secured law licenses and are called lawyers and have had their salaries raised two or three times to double and treble of what they really earn. I could give you a list of them that would astonish you.

I have carefully checked up this 1923 Reclassification Act with respect to the District government. Please get our hearings and see how salaries have been doubled and even trebled since 1923. Did you know you have the highest-paid officials in the District government of any municipal government on earth? Check it up with all of the comparable cities. They have all had their salaries here doubled and more than doubled since 1923. I put an army of them in the hearings last year, giving their names and positions and showing what salaries they drew before the 1923 Reclassification Act and the salaries they have drawn under that act since 1923. And still they do not seem to be satisfied with their tremendously large unearned salaries. They are seeking extra outside remuneration.

Let me mention one of the municipal court judges here in Washington. Do you know that they are the court of lowest jurisdiction and rank with the ordinary justice of the peace or county court judge in some of the States? It has the lowest jurisdiction of any court in Washington. They try civil cases only involving amounts from $1 to $1,000 which is the extent of their jurisdiction. They try no criminal cases, and yet these municipal judges of minor importance have succeeded in getting themselves graded under this 1923 Classification Act until they draw $8,000 a year, when, in a great majority of States of the Union, the circuit judges get only about $4,500 a year, and these circuit judges in States have unlimited jurisdiction and try men for their lives and try cases involving property rights amounting to millions of dollars. One of the best lawyers here in Washington told me this morning that if Congress were to reduce the salaries of these municipal court judges to $2,400 not one of them would resign, and that in his opinion they would be adequately paid. Yet under this Reclassification Act of 1923 they draw $8,000 per year.

The judges here who compare with our State circuit court judges presiding over courts of record are called supreme court judges. The higher or appellate court here is called the court of appeals, and your judges on the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia get salaries of $12,500 a year. Think of it. How many supreme court judges in your State back home get as much as $12,500 a year? They are not satisfied with $12,500 salaries. Some of them have to deliver law lectures to these law schools for additional pay.

Later on, when I get time, I am going to put in the RECORD the names of some of them who are now getting pay from these law schools of local universities.

There are nine judges of this Supreme Court, or trial court, of the District of Columbia. The membership of this court was formerly not so large, and has been increased from time to time since I have been in Congress the judges claimed they were overworked. Yet we have found out that for several years seven out of those nine judges, getting salaries of $10,000 a year, have been hiring themselves out to these so-called law colleges in Washington for extra pay.

One of them called me up the other day and intimated that "Congress cannot control us, we are Federal judges." I said, "If you are Federal judges we have a law already that controls you, because Federal judges cannot accept outside employment."

Reverting again to our municipal court judges who get $8,000 a year to do ordinary justice-of-the-peace work, we asked them to tell us whether they accepted outside employment, and what outside pay they received. One of them wrote in effect, "It is none of the business of Congress what we do after 4 o'clock." That is about the substance of what he said although he couched his contempt for Congress in diplomatic language. He contended that it was none of the business of Congress what he did after he got off the bench, but he would not tell us what college he was serving, or what outside pay he was getting.

Our committee brought him before us at a hearing, and I wish you could have heard the distinguished Republican member of our subcommittee, one of the ablest Members of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER] [applause] during his questioning of this important judge.

I wish you could have heard him all through the examination of this judge. He twisted him up until the judge did not know whether he was "going or coming." [Laughter.] We ascertained finally that in addition to the $8,000 a year salary this municipal judge was drawing, he was also getting $800 a year for conducting a moot court at Columbus University; $500 for conducting a moot court for the National University; and $500 for conducting a moot court for the Howard University. That annually was in addition to the $8,000 salary he is drawing for running the municipal court in Washington.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER] asked him if he did not think the people had a right to expect him when he got on the bench to have a clear mind and a rested body and not worked down by holding moot courts. He had the audacity to say it was very helpful to every judge to conduct such a court and come in contact with the young, embryo lawyers of the country.

We also had before us the acting corporation counsel of the District, Mr. West, who draws $7,000 as assistant corporation counsel for the city. We found out that in addition to getting $7,000 a year salary, he is teaching in the National University as an instructor in law. In addition to teaching there, he is appointed on the examining and grievance committee to examine lawyers. He not only teaches them but examines them to see whether they are good lawyers.

For that he admitted that he had already this year received $939, and he expected another division of fees for this fall's examination of about $900. He did not stop there. In addition to that, he said that he had been appointed by one of the judges on the bench here as a receiver in a case involving assets of $45,000 and that the usual receivership fee was 5 percent of the valuation of the property. So that 5 percent of $45,000 would be divided between him and his coreceivers. He receives $7,000 salary as assistant corporation counsel, and a salary for conducting the law school and $900 for examining lawyers and then the receivership fee on top of it. All Members of Congress had better quit sitting in this House of Representatives and get a job on these municipal and police court benches here if we want to make money. We could double our income if we could get out of Congress and get on one of these little municipal or police courts here.

That is not the main vice of it—this accepting of outside employment. I will show you what the main vice is. Do you know that in that corporation counsel's office we showed by him yesterday that if vacancies were filled they would have 19 lawyers—the corporation counsel and 18 assistants—and I guarantee to you that outside of New York and possibly 2 other States there are 45 States in the Union that have not as many lawyers in their attorney general's department as does the District of Columbia in its city attorney's office. I guarantee to you there are 45 States in the Union the personnel of whose attorney general's office, from the attorney general down to the lowest assistant, do not get salaries comparable to the salaries paid these assistant corporation counsel here in the District of Columbia. Here is a list of them and their salaries: Corporation counsel—now vacant—salary, $9,000.

Show me the States that have more attorneys, with larger salaries in their attorney general's department of state, than are paid the city attorneys of Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. With your permission, later on I shall put into the RECORD a list of these many embryo so-called law colleges here that are grinding out these half-baked lawyerettes every month or two, and I shall show you the effect it has on the pay roll of the Government of the United States in all of its bureaus and departments.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. COX. With regard to the statement of the gentleman as to what he will insert in the RECORD, I have a feeling that the House ought to be indulgent and offer all possible encouragement to the gentleman and his committee, because they have to take the abuse of everybody in Washington with a grievance against the Congress. While the gentleman and his committee may sometimes find themselves discouraged in the thought that the House is not fully appreciative of their labor and is not giving them full support, nevertheless what the gentleman and his committee have done has brought information to the House which I believe has created a sentiment that will support any proposal the gentleman might bring here looking toward the reform of the municipal government of the city of Washington.

In other words, speaking for myself, I have never been able to justify in my own mind the taxing of the people in the outlying area of the country for the support of the municipal government of Washington, and I believe if the gentleman can ever present the issue to the House the House will take action which will in effect wipe out all this Federal contribution we have been making for many years to the support of the municipal government.

Mr. BLANTON. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. COX. There is not a great city in the country but would be glad to duplicate the entire governmental establishment we have here in Washington as an inducement to have the seat of government located in its midst. If it were not for the Government, the city of Washington would hardly be more than a crossroads town. The gentleman has the support of the country and, I think, this House in this fight he is making.

Mr. BLANTON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. For one who sits on this side of the aisle, I have always recognized the tireless energy of the gentleman from Texas. Was there any evidence as to the volume of work imposed on the district attorney's office as compared with an attorney general's office in a State?

Mr. BLANTON. In reply to the question asked by our distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER], the acting corporation counsel said they were completely up with their work. They are completely up with their work and yet are always asking for an assistant down there, and put on two extra without authority from Congress, and still are teaching on the side, selling their services to law schools here. Why, there is one fellow down there practicing law, and he said that he takes care of all his clients, practicing on the side. We want to stop that and we are going to call on the House to help us stop it.

Mr. DONDERO. Does the gentleman mean that he is drawing a salary from the district attorney's office and still practicing law on the outside?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. In addition to that?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. I mentioned also that the chief assistant, Mr. West, is getting a $7,000 salary, and gets pay for teaching in a law college, and is engaged in a receivership case which involved $45,000 worth of property, and also gets $900 twice a year on a law committee. I do not believe that a judge on a bench ought ever to engage in any outside business or engage in the sale of his services to anybody else. I was on the circuit bench for 8 years, and it took every moment of my time to properly discharge the duties of my office.

I did not have time to go out and act as receiver. I did not have time to go out and practice law. I did not have time to go out and lecture to a university law school. I did not have time to pass on examination papers for twice $900 a year. It took every minute of my time while I was on the circuit bench for 8 years to discharge my duties.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and put in some informative data that I expect to use.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I want to call to the attention of the membership of the House the Navy Department appropriation bill which we have before us this afternoon. The principal thing to which I want to direct attention is the increase in this appropriation this year over what it was a year ago. If the figures have been correctly given to me by the chief clerk of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the appropriation last year was $460,421,879. The appropriation asked in this bill at the present time is $532,785,807, or an increase of $72,363,928.

I do not know whether this is the beginning of a naval race, as far as a building program is concerned, or not. It evidently looks like it, however.

I want also to call your attention to the fact that the War Department appropriation last year was $422,896,470. This year the appropriation as it passed the House was $543,341,506, or an increase of $121,445,036. A great increase.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I prefer not to yield until I give my statement with reference to the expenditures, and then I will yield to the gentleman if I have time.

Now, we have increased our appropriations very, very materially. We talk peace and prepare for war. In round figures, the appropriations for war have been increased over $300,000,000 over last year. I want it distinctly understood that I am in favor of adequate protection, but I have never been able to find anybody who could define that word. It is left to the discretion of the individual Members of the House to determine just what "adequate protection" means. I assure you that I will be the last man to vote for a war of aggression. I will take a great many insults, I might say, from foreign people before I would want to embroil our country in war, because I do not believe any question can be satisfactorily settled by taking up arms and trying to kill off the people of this world in order to settle a dispute.

I want to call the attention of the majority Members to a statement made by the majority leader, Mr. BANKHEAD, on yesterday, when he stated before this House that he was in favor of cutting down Government expenses. I want to call to the attention of the majority leader as well as the members of the various committees on the Democratic side of the House who have the influence to determine the legislation that is to be passed by this body, that you have increased the appropriation bills this year as follows:

The Department of Agriculture appropriation bill over $14,000,000; independent offices, over $75,000,000; Department of the Interior, over $4,000,000; Treasury and Post Office, over $29,000,000; State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor, over $8,000,000. Now remember the increases for the Army and the Navy.

In other words, in round figures, about $325,000,000 increases in appropriations this year by the House of Representatives over what they were a year ago.

I want to call the attention of the majority to the fact that in the Senate at the present time every one of the bills under consideration has been materially increased. A number of those bills are in conference at the present time. They are coming back to the floor of this House and the conferees will ask you to approve them. What are you going to do? The responsibility rests on this majority party. You can see by the votes in the last few days that when the orders come down the Avenue for you fellows to crack into line and put a certain bill through, like you did the tax bill yesterday, and such a ridiculous bill as it was, that you whip into line practically a hundred percent. That responsibility is yours, and you have to face your people back home when it comes to that.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Democratic Party to plank no. 1 of your platform:

> The Democratic Party solemnly promises, by appropriate action, to put into effect the principles, policies, and reforms herein advocated; and to eradicate the policies, methods, and practices herein condemned. First, we advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of Government expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance to accomplish a saving of not less than 25 percent in the cost of Federal Government; and we call upon the Democratic Party in the States to make zealous effort to achieve a proportionate result.

You also promised to balance the Budget. I wonder whether the members of the Democratic Party know what they are doing. The President of the United States said, "I stand by this platform and am for it 100 percent." The chairman of the Democratic National Committee, James A. Farley, who is also Postmaster General, and who is also State chairman of the Democratic Party of the State of New York—holding triple offices—also stands on that platform. I wonder whether that man even knows who the President of the United States is? [Laughter.] He promised economy, and he evidently does not know the meaning of the word.

I am going to quote to you from Mr. Farley. Speaking over a Nation-wide hook-up, Chairman James A. Farley, of the Democratic National Committee, on the night of November 9, 1932, the night after the Presidential election, said:

> You may be sure when Franklin D. Roosevelt makes a promise to an individual or to a Nation that promise will be fulfilled, for he makes none beyond his power to make his pledges come true. He is pledged to an economical and an efficient government of our national affairs. He will choose nobody incapable or unwilling to conduct the Government on that basis.

If Jim Farley knew who the President was in 1932, I wonder if he would recognize him if he walked past him on Pennsylvania Avenue knowing the promises contained in the Democratic platform and comparing them with actual results?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I cannot yield until I have finished this financial statement; then I will yield.

The results and the promises are as far apart as the North Pole is from the South Pole, as daylight is from darkness, as far apart as any contrast you may choose to make. Are we going to continue in this same direction? The President of the United States said on January 3:

> We are approaching a balanced Budget.

If anything was ever ridiculous, in my judgment, that is it. He knew better when he made the statement. If he would only refer to the daily statement of the United States Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, Secretary of the Treasury—and I hold in my hand the one for April 24, 1936; I have referred in the past to the one for January 3, 1936—the President would know that his statement was not at all correct. I call your attention in this statement to the fact that the total receipts of the Federal Government for the year up to the present time is $3,294,634,000, the total expenditures are $5,874,203,000, the excess of expenditures over receipts is $2,579,529,000. I also call your attention to the fact that the national deficit at the present time is $31,436,531,000, in round figures, there being some odd dollars. On top of that, you must add $2,000,000,000 due to devaluation of gold that was spent and charged off the statement. This is an astounding figure, an astounding burden you are putting on the youth of this country when we today say we are not capable of shouldering it. How can they?

I have said before—I say it again—that we Members of Congress may not be fools, but we certainly do the things that fools would do. If anything is tending to wreck this Nation financially, this administration is doing it. I even had a Member of Congress say to me yesterday, and he is a Democratic Member, too: "I believe that the President of the United States has designs on trying to change our form of Government." I think the man was right; I think the man was sincere when he made that statement. I know this sentiment has been expressed not only by Republicans and Democrats in the House of Representatives, but by many people on the outside. I believe it; I believe it, and I have no hesitancy in saying so. I did not ride in here on President Roosevelt's coattails and do not need to apologize to him or anybody else for making the statement I just made. If I thought the man was honest, I could probably forgive him because he is so dumb, but if he is so dumb he cannot see the things that he is doing, and that he is trying to wreck our form of government, then I think it is time for the American people to wake up.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I have a lot of things I want to say about this. I want to try to get the people of the country to realize what we are doing. I do not want so much the people of this country to hear me as I want the membership of this House to hear me. This is a serious, solemn time in the history of this Nation, most serious.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I cannot yield.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman mentioned a change in the form of government. Just what form of government does the gentleman think he has in mind when he said that? Let us know the full scope of this matter.

Mr. RICH. He is directing us toward a Russianized soviet union of states, if I know anything about it. He is the dictator at the present time, but we are going beyond the point of dictation. We are going to get to the point where all the freedom of the American people is going to be lost. In 1776 we fought, for the freedom of America, the War of Independence. The ultimate object was freedom. The enlightened people of America say: "Oh, we will never stand for a Russianized form of government; we are too bright, too intelligent"; but I am telling you and the other Members of the House of Representatives that some of these days this thing is going to crush in on you, and it is going to wind you up so quick that you will be ground under the foot of a dictator. It will be most shocking to every Member of this Congress, because he has had a part in the legislation that was passed in the last 2 or 3 years, and you will all wonder why we have been so doggoned dumb as to pass a lot of this legislation. I am glad I voted against most of it, especially every act that has been declared by the Supreme Court unconstitutional.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I cannot yield to the gentleman from Texas. I would have to yield first to the chairman of the committee. I am not going to yield to anyone until I yield to the chairman. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to yield this floor until I get all of this out of my system.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman would not refuse to yield to a pal, would he?

Mr. RICH. I am not going to yield to the gentleman from Texas; however, I have heard him condemn the things that are being done at the present time, and I do not want him to help me out, because Mr. Roosevelt might go down in his district and try to defeat him. He is too valuable a man to defeat. I want him to stay here to try to cut down Government expenses. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will not my pal yield to a question?

Mr. RICH. The gentleman is too valuable a man, and I do not want to get him into trouble because of anything I may say. I will protect you from Mr. Roosevelt and Jim Farley.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me ask the gentleman just one question.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield.

Mr. Chairman, what would have happened if we had joined the League of Nations? You can see what has happened to the League of Nations in the past year when Italy defied the League and went down there in Africa to conquer Ethiopia, a little country in the northern part of Africa. If we had become a member of the League of Nations, we would be compelled to use this Navy for which we are appropriating money in this bill to go over there and defend those countries in Europe. We would probably have to spend three or four times as much money to build a bigger Navy. We would have to go over to those people and get involved in another world war, and we hope they will not become involved in a war over there. But in the meantime little Ethiopia must submit. Why? Because the League of Nations states they are powerless to do anything. If we were a member of the League of Nations, you can see how vital it would be to this country. We would either have to back down or we would have to go over there and fight a war. And what for? Why, to prevent Italy from conquering that little country, Ethiopia. You will remember the treaty that was made a few years ago, what we called the 5–5–3 ratio so far as the building of battleships was concerned. This treaty involves England, Japan, and the United States. Well, Japan said, so far as the treaty was concerned, they were not going to abide by it, and started out to build battleships and cruisers. Consequently, they withdrew. England has started to build more battleships. What are we doing? We are now trying to follow the course of England and Japan by increasing our Navy. A naval race has started. What for, peace or war?

Mr. Chairman, if we were honest and conscientious in our endeavor to keep down governmental expenses, if we were sincere in trying to protect our shores, we would not do what is sought to be done by this naval appropriation bill. We are cutting down appropriations for aviation instead of increasing them, and we are increasing the appropriations for the building of battleships instead of cutting them down.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. No; I have a lot more I want to say.

Mr. Chairman, if we wanted to protect our own shores, we would increase the appropriations for aviation. We would not increase the number of battleships. Why do we want these big battleships costing forty or fifty million dollars? Just so we can take our soldiers over to foreign shores to fight in foreign countries. We do not want to do that. We should protect our American shores; therefore we ought to increase our appropriations for aviation so that we can protect the Americans here at home. That is the thing that ought to be done. Protect our own shores from aggression by a foe, stay at home and attend to our own people and our own business, and we will have plenty to do. Let us be a peaceful nation. Be a friend to all the world.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute if he will yield to me for a question.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, in fairness to the chairman of the committee, I would have to yield to him, and if I had only 1 minute, I could not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to accept the time.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN].

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, on April 2 the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] addressed us on the evil of permitting our Postmaster General to act as National Democratic Chairman, and also upon an alleged spoils system adopted by the present administration.

In the record of the Republican National Committee the titles of vice chairman and acting chairman are so frequently used, and real chairmen are so well camouflaged by dummies, that the real chairman is hard to locate. However, it is very apparent that Postmaster Generals Payne, Cortelyou, and Hays at some time during their incumbency were chairmen of the Republican organization.

But is there any honest man who will deny even to himself that when Harry New and Walter Brown were Postmasters, and Harry Daugherty was Attorney General, they were not in truth and in fact the directing executives of the Republican organization?

These precedents are not given as a reason for the appointment of General Farley as Democratic Chairman. It will be a very hopeless day for this Republic when the Democratic Party models its governmental policy and shapes its ideas of public service after the conduct of the gentlemen who occupy the saddle whenever the Republican Party is in power.

The fact is that good public service occasionally requires that the National Chairman be given a fairly lucrative public position. Political chairmen are not orchids; they cannot gather sustenance from the air; they must have a substantial reliable means of support; and with this in mind, a party must choose for its chairman a man from one of three types:

First. One of sufficient wealth to have unlimited leisure.

Second. One who will obtain his livelihood either from private bribes, Government contracts, or from contributions to his party organization.

Third. One publicly and frankly on the governmental pay roll.

If we take the men of wealth and leisure, the unavoidable tendency will be to shower governmental favors on the social class of the party chairman.

If we require our chairman to get his pay either directly or indirectly from private sources, experience and common sense tell us that such contributions are seldom made from patriotic motives.

While the third choice—of putting our party chairman on the governmental pay roll—has its disadvantages, at least it reduces temptation to a minimum, while legal contracts with the Government are impossible. Such a public officer is also subject to exceptional public scrutiny because of an opportunity for making political capital out of his mistakes. This stimulus to efficiency should more than offset the time consumed in political activities.

POSTMASTER GENERAL FARLEY'S RECORD

The record of Postmaster General Farley gives no evidence of impaired public service. The last full year of Republican control—1932—showed a postal deficit of $153,000,000. The first full year of Democratic control—1934—showed a postal surplus of twelve million, although the postal receipts were $1,400,000 more in 1932 than in 1934.

Mr. LEHLBACH and Mr. KNUTSON rose.

Mr. HARLAN. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Does the gentleman know that two different systems of bookkeeping were employed by the Postmaster General under the Hoover administration and Postmaster General Farley, and does he not know that Postmaster General Farley charged off all franked mail and other services of a similar character which were included in the report of the Hoover Postmaster General?

Mr. HARLAN. In 1930 the method of accounting in the Post Office Department was changed by act of Congress (U. S. Code, ch. 39, sec. 793). At that time the franked mail and the different subsidies were taken off of the charge of the Post Office Department, but identically the same method of accounting whereby a Republican deficit of $153,000,000 was created in 1932 was used in 1934, when the Democratic surplus was realized.

I cannot yield further now, unless the gentleman can disprove that statement.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HARLAN. If the gentleman will investigate he will find I am not mistaken and that the change was made in 1930.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes; those items were segregated in 1930, but were not subtracted at that time.

Mr. HARLAN. Unfortunately the gentleman is wrong. The gentleman is usually so eminently correct in his statement of fact and even in his deductions when partisan politics are not involved that I regret his error here. He is merely repeating some false propaganda manufactured by the Republican committee. One short glance at General Brown's report in 1930 will show him that all such items, amounting to $40,000,000, were then subtracted and have been so ever since.

Again in 1935, after all salaries had been restored and drop-letter rates reduced one-third, a postal surplus of nearly $5,000,000 was recorded. These two surpluses have been the first ones in the Postal Department since the last Democratic administration of President Wilson, and they follow 12 years of Republican maladministration, when postal receipts were at their highest. In 1930, with receipts at a peak of over $705,000,000, our taxpayers paid a tribute to Republican inefficiency and/or corruption to the tune of a $58,000,000 net deficit, or $98,000,000 gross.

Yet the gentleman from New Jersey 4 years ago with equal zeal pointed with pride to the achievements of that administration and now views the present one with alarm.

PUBLIC INDIFFERENT TO POLITICS

Mr. Chairman, the overwhelming majority of our citizens are not interested in such flapdoodle. There are those who criticize this administration because they seek political success for themselves. There are those who literally hate this administration because their style of playing the game has been somewhat cramped. There are those who by temperament fear the untried and constantly seek to hold back the sands of time.

Outside of these groups, criticism of this administration, even when based on facts, as it occasionally is, falls on deaf ears. They cannot hear the criticism because of the crescendo of accomplishment. They are proud of our President, his courage to try, his human touch, and the achievements of his Cabinet.

CIVIL SERVICE UNDER DEMOCRACY

The sensibilities of the gentleman from New Jersey are deeply offended by an imagined disregard of civil-service requirements. He says:

For the first time in half a century of civil service, protected employees in the regular departments of the Government have decreased instead of increased.

The truth is that the number of civil-service employees has actually increased instead of decreased during this administration; and if the number had decreased it would have been but one of 12 such events in the last half century. One of these decreases was from June 1932 to June 1933, 8 months of which were under Hoover, where 11,000 classified employees were discharged.

The best available estimates and figures show that our present classified employees exceed 459,000 as against 456,000 in June 1933, an increase of over 3,000 instead of a decrease, as alleged.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. When did they raise the postage to 3 cents?

Mr. HARLAN. Under President Hoover, and it remained at 3 cents until 1934, when we reduced it to 2 cents for drop letters.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman has in mind the crippled service, especially in rural-district post offices.

Mr. HARLAN. Of course, there have been some anti-administration communities that have complained.

Mr. GIFFORD. Is not the gentleman aware of the order of the Postmaster General to close up these country post offices which have been closed?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. WEARIN. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the Post Office Department has been maintaining small, unprofitable post offices in some sections of the United States for political purposes, and the order of the Postmaster General was to eliminate those that were losing money, for the public interest, but he gave the same service through rural routes.

Mr. HARLAN. That is certainly true. Many rural offices were closed and better service given by putting them on rural routes. General Farley has lengthened those routes to take them out of horse-and-wagon age, recognizing that we now have automobiles.

It is true that from 1933 to 1934 the classified employees decreased in number 5,500, but let us recall that during that year the Post Office Department turned a deficit of $53,000,000 into a surplus of twelve million. This was partly done by reducing personnel by 17,000. This reduction was made, not to create spoils, as the gentleman's innuendo would indicate, but to effect an economy.

He states that all appointees of new agencies are outside of civil service. Either by act of Congress or through Executive order practically all positions in 13 of these agencies are now under civil service:

The Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Communications Commission, the Railroad Retirement Board, Bituminous Coal Commission, Motor Carrier Bureau of the Interstate Commerce Commission, Social Security Board, Labor Relations Board, Public Utility Regulation, Soil Conservation Service, Collectors of Cotton Statistics, Alien Property Custodian, Farm Credit Administration, United States Railroad Administration, and certain positions in the C. C. C. camps.

Three others, the Federal Housing Administration, the Tennessee Valley Authority, and the Resettlement Administration, are getting large numbers of employees from the civil-service lists; a third of the A. A. A. employees came from civil-service registers, and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and Tennessee Valley Authority conduct their own examinations on a plan that will compare favorably with the civil service.

The gentleman complains that some of the departments have required congressional recommendations before making appointments. This is true as to a part of those appointments made outside of a civil-service or other examination. However, is there a sane executive, governmental or otherwise, anywhere that would not require his chief appointees, at least, to be sympathetic with his aims and purposes? That is just horse sense.

But to say that these clearances were solely on political lines is pure nonsense. In my district, the Third Ohio, one of the candidates for the Republican nomination for Congress was for some time employed by the Agriculture Department.

This condition is so uniform throughout the country that both in the Democratic congressional caucus and in our political organizations throughout the country there has repeatedly flared up so much resentment against the flood of Republican appointees as to reach the proportion of a revolt.

No higher proof of the nonpolitical character of these appointees is needed, also than the sub rosa and bitter complaints of Republican politicians that these appointments are undermining their own party by converting reactionaries into liberals. Congressional recommendation—yes, to determine the applicant's sympathy with the purposes of the position sought but not for political spoils.

The gentleman charges that barely more than half of our nonmilitary employees are under civil service. The best available figures show 57 percent classified. His inaccuracy there is pretty good for an election year.

However, Mr. Chairman, that low figure is obtained by including all the temporary employees of the different relief agencies, which, under present law, will soon be released. If these are eliminated the ratio of civil service to nonclassified employees would reach 70 percent, and, as shown before, is rapidly growing.

Democracy brought civil service into being after a 20-year battle with Republican carpetbagging, spoils, and corruption. No one with any true Democratic blood in his veins can help but regret the dire necessity that required the temporary partial setting aside of the civil-service system.

What was that necessity? The urgent and immediate need of relief. These administration agencies not only functioned to bring relief, but the individuals employed by the agencies themselves were taken from the unemployed.

To have thrown all of this employment under the civil service would have meant the practical creation of one more huge governmental agency and tragic delay. It would have meant employment entirely on the basis of merit, when need was the paramount issue. It would have meant employment by State quotas, when need did not follow State lines. It would have placed an arbitrary age limitation to all applicants when need recognized no such factors. It would have required all employees in the same classification to receive the same pay, when necessity required the spreading of employment to as large numbers as possible, with less pay in the emergency agencies than the regular establishments.

In short, to have complied with civil-service regulations and at the same time fight the depression in 1933 were wholly incompatible.

But those days are over. The civil service is being rapidly restored to its proper status and will remain so unless some succeeding Republican administration does as did President Harding—start it in reverse purely for political purposes.

History will record the Republican Party as one of the greatest enigmas of American institutions: Born of a love of human freedom, cradled in the highest idealism, composed of millions of our finest citizens, and given power when a combination of natural and economic forces irresistibly thrust prosperity upon us. Every element in its background and environment was favorable to an unblemished record.

Yet practically the only time its leadership has ever achieved the virtue cherished by its founders and professed in its preelection platforms is when it is out of office. From the terror and corruption of reconstruction days to the latest air-mail subsidy scandal, its leadership has taken to itself every sordid act of governmental debauchery recorded in Federal annals.

Nevertheless, it has continued to perpetuate itself in power because of the skillful dissemination of the legend that it was the cause, rather than one of the effects, of our phenomenal prosperity. For the fleshpots our people have been willing to vote away their heritage. From 1929 to 1933, however, this prosperity legend was most thoroughly deflated. If the Republican leadership is again able to befuddle its former supporters into a renewal of confidence, it will not only remain an enigma—it will be an outstanding example of a modern miracle.

There was once a turtle who walked this earth in great complacency. His only interests were of the flesh, and he was not disturbed about the pains or wants of others. His eyes were constantly turned toward the clod and food. A great barometric depression came, followed by a storm. A strong gust of wind blew this turtle on his back. He struggled and wriggled for hours to right himself, but to no purpose. The storm subsided, the sun set, and the stars began to blink. For the first time this turtle beheld the beauty of the firmament. In wonder and awe he ceased his struggle. He lay until morning looking at the stars, regretting his wasted past. He even became thankful for his misfortune.

Then a swollen freshet reached this turtle and washed him again aright. Once more he resumed his complacent walk, grumbling of Nature's extravagant waste of water, happy in his rugged individualism; indifferent to the pain or wants of others, forgetful of his moral rebirth in adversity, ungrateful for his deliverance.

Turtles have been that way ever since. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO].

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, on the 11th of March 1934, a very important national and international project received a congressional anesthetic in this Capitol and for more than 2 years it has been sleeping among the forgotten names.

By a vote of 46 to 42, the Senate of the United States failed to ratify or approve the proposed treaty with the Dominion of Canada for the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway. That action removed, at least temporarily, the dream of two friendly nations from the stage of public attention.

Its defeat has been a disappointment to the hopes of millions of people living in the interior of the United States and Canada.

For more than two centuries this subject has attracted their attention and stirred their vision. For more than 30 years it has held their interest in its planning.

My purpose in addressing the House today is to call to the attention of this body and the people of our country this forgotten but most vital national question.

When the Supreme Engineer of the universe determined to create the greatest fresh-water seas on this globe He placed them near the center of a great continent and connected them by a single highway 1,000 miles long with the oceans of the world—the St. Lawrence River. So generous has been the Great Builder to mankind that he left it to the children of men almost wholly unobstructed and unimpaired.

The completion of the St. Lawrence seaway is a subject of absorbing interest to two friendly governments. Two nations whose people speak the same language and read the same Bible, whose national aspirations and economic problems are much the same. Two nations which have maintained for over 100 years an international boundary or frontier more than 3,000 miles in extent without a fort, without a gun, without a soldier, and without even as much as a suspicion. Nowhere else in the world does a similar situation exist.

If a link of track 48 miles in length of one of our transcontinental railroads was obstructed by grade or rock, if a section 48 miles long of the Lincoln Highway was washed out by flood, which made it impassable for through traffic, a way would be found at once to remove the rock from the railroad and replace the concrete on the highway to make them safe and passable for all purposes.

That is substantially the situation that exists relative to the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway. The connecting channels and harbors of the Great Lakes are to be deepened to 27 feet to conform to the depth of the seaway. Most of this work has been done. Canada has completed the Welland Canal at her own expense, costing $128,000,000.

The project has a number of objectives. The President pointed out in his message advocating the treaty that navigation and power were the two main considerations. There are other benefits. Forty million people living in that midcontinent area would be liberated from land-locked transportation and given the right to "go down to the sea in ships."

The great need of cheaper water transportation would advance the economic welfare of the Nation; it would aid the farmers, recapture our export trade, provide employment, and make possible cheap rural electrification in New England and northern United States.

President Roosevelt in his message to the Senate said (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 10, 1934, p. 338):

> I am convinced that the building of the St. Lawrence seaway will not injure the railroads or throw their employees out of work; that it will not in any way interfere with the proper use of the Mississippi River or the Missouri River for navigation.
> I have not stressed the fact that the starting of this great work will put thousands of unemployed to work. I have preferred to stress the great future advantages of our country, and especially the fact that all of us should view this treaty in the light of the benefits which it confers on the people of the United States as a whole.

Statistics show that river and harbor work yields 76 cents out of every dollar to the laboring man.

Twenty-three States have endorsed the undertaking. Every board and commission designated by the two Governments to examine and study the problem has reported favorably for its construction.

The people of the Nation have a right to ask, Does the saving and advantage of the waterway justify the cost? Its cost is to be borne equally by the two Governments, and the amount has been estimated by the engineers at $540,000,000, or $270,000,000 as the share of each.

From that sum may be subtracted $89,000,000 proposed to be paid by the State of New York for power rights, leaving $181,000,000 to be paid over a period of 10 years—being the estimated time to complete the work—or about $18,000,000 a year.

This is not a political question. President Hoover and the Republican Party were committed to the plan. President Roosevelt has advocated its completion.

We must justify the cost or the venture is unsound economically.

The average of all estimates of new tonnage available to the seaway is 20,000,000 tons. The total tonnage of the United States in 1935 was 414,000,000 tons, of which 91,000,000 tons moved on the Great Lakes, or 22 percent of the Nation's water-borne commerce.

If the United States hopes to recapture its export grain market, it must meet competitive world prices. The States of the upper Mississippi Valley include the world's greatest food-producing region. It is the granary and flour barrel of the Nation. It is a thousand miles from the sea. Russia's grain area is 300 miles from Odessa, Rumania 200 miles, and the Argentine 300 miles from point of export. It is obvious that we cannot compete with other grain-producing nations of the world because of the far-removed location of the point of production from ports of shipment by water.

From Chicago to Buffalo is found the busiest maritime commerce in the world. Although a thousand miles from seaboard, the commerce up the St. Lawrence River has made Montreal the second largest seaport on the Atlantic. Nearly 125,000,000 tons of water-borne commerce originate on the Great Lakes annually, and in one season 100,000,000 tons passed through the Detroit River. That was more commerce in tonnage than passed through the Panama Canal in the first 9 years of its existence.

In a single season, 1928, the number of ships that passed through the locks in the St. Lawrence River equaled one for every half hour night and day, Sundays and holidays, and exceeded 8,000,000 tons.

No one can accurately measure the benefits that will accrue to the cities, and also the States, of the Great Lakes region and the interior of the United States when ocean and Lakes are brought together by the completion of the seaway. Lake ports will become ocean ports and 85 percent of all the ships of the world may, and I believe will, become friendly visitors of trade. The result will be that the farmer and the industrialist of a landlocked empire—the Middle West—can compete on a basis of nearer equality with their seaboard competitors and 40,000,000 people can buy and sell in the markets of the world at the lowest cost of transportation.

The people have a right to know whether or not the cost of the seaway can be justified and whether its completion is a sound business venture.

Today the largest industry in the United States is the automobile industry, with the manufacture of more than 80 percent of all cars centered in the State of Michigan, most of which is located in or near Detroit and some of it in the district which I have the honor to represent. Based on a 5-year average, it has been estimated that 375,000 cars could be exported annually at a saving of $42.50 per car, or $15,000,000 annually; a saving of 10 cents a bushel on wheat; a saving of $10 per ton in the shipment of meats, lard, and dairy products; and $5 per ton on steel could be realized.

The Chicago Tribune, September 25, 1932, said in its editorial:

> If the St. Lawrence seaway is built, it is altogether probable that it would permit economies in manufacture and the transport of paper which might amount to as much as $3 per ton on the 100,000 tons of paper which the Tribune consumes each year. The building of the waterway would mean an annual increase in the net profits out of this newspaper of $300,000.

In the State of Wisconsin exists a very large manufacturing concern, makers of plumbing and bathroom supplies. It imports large amounts of ball clays and china clays from England. On 11 shiploads the net savings in cost of transportation was $89,000. The ships were small enough to navigate the 14-foot locks in the St. Lawrence. If they were 30 feet the economic utility would be much greater.

The world's largest independent producer of automobile engines is located in Michigan. To ship by rail one of its engines from Muskegon, Mich., to San Francisco costs $4.57 per 100 pounds. The rate via Philadelphia to San Francisco is $2.80 per 100 pounds—a difference of $1.77, or 38.6 percent. The rail rate from Philadelphia to San Francisco is $1.60 plus 2 cents wharfage. The water rate is but 46 cents per hundred more to ship an engine 6,000 miles than it costs to ship the same engine 796 miles by rail.

The saving on agricultural and manufactured products exported would also apply to all commodities imported.

The States tributary to the waterway furnish the following portion of our commerce: 44 percent of our meat exports, 18 percent of our flour, 42 percent of our farm machinery, 17 percent of our iron and steel, 65 percent of our imports of crude rubber, 33 percent of our imports of coffee and tea, and 60 percent of our imports of pulpwood.

The merchant marine of the world consists of about 9,400 ships; two-thirds, or 6,300, have drafts of 25 feet or less. There are three kinds of vessels—cargo ships, combination freight and passenger ships, and tankers. Of these, 6,800 are freight ships, 1,400 combination freight and passenger ships, and 1,200 tankers. Ninety percent of the freighters could use the seaway; 90 percent of the tankers and 70 percent of the combination freight and passenger ships could also make use of it.

The official summary of the report of the Corps of Engineers says (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 31, 1934, p. 1659):

> In estimating the savings on other commodities the average saving per ton on the typical commodities was used. It was realized that the navigation season on the St. Lawrence would be about 8 months per year and a reduction of about one-third in the potential tonnage was arbitrarily made for this reason.
> The figures, as reduced, were found to indicate an export tonnage of 7,471,500 tons, with an indicated saving of $44,810,923. Similarly import tonnage was estimated at 5,742,333 tons and the savings on the movement at $34,082,207. * * *
> Comparison with the important ship canals of the world, including the Manchester, Kiel, Suez, Panama Canals, and the North Sea Canal to Amsterdam, in terms of length of restricted navigation, depth, bottom, width, and locks, shows that the proposed seaway is completely practical for navigation by ocean cargo vessels. The completed seaway from Duluth to the Atlantic Ocean will provide a waterway in which vessels may move with unrestricted speed over approximately 97 percent of the total distance.

Through the years the interior of the country has not complained about paying $53,000,000 to make Philadelphia a seaport, 101 miles inland; $35,000,000 for New Orleans, 110 miles inland; $58,000,000 to improve the harbor of New York; $102,000,000 for flood control in the Mississippi Valley—and many millions more are now being asked for flood control.

Accepting the annual saving in transportation costs as estimated by our engineers at $78,000,000, the seaway would more than pay for itself in 3 years. No such claim or the necessity for their construction can be made for the Florida ship canal, the Passamaquoddy project, the Grande Coulee Dam and others on which millions of dollars of public money is being expended while the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway, a project of national and international import affecting more than one-third of the people of the Nation, slumbers and is forgotten.

Its cost spread over a period of 10 years would entail an annual expenditure of $16,000,000 to $18,000,000; not a very large sum when compared to other amounts now being lavished on other works.

Bearing on the importance of this great waterway to the sea, it is pertinent to note that the St. Marys Canal, between Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., and Ontario, carries the largest amount of water-borne commerce of all the artificial waterways of the world.

Imports on the Great Lakes, according to the report of the Chief of Engineers of the Army for the year 1934, amounted to more than 4,000,000 tons, valued at $119,000,000, of which only 271,000 tons, valued at $10,000,000, were imports from overseas. This tragically small amount of foreign water-borne commerce to the inland seas is the answer to the necessity and the importance of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway.

Our exports for 1934 on the Great Lakes were nine and a half million tons, twice our imports, valued at $56,000,000, of which only 71,000 tons, valued at $3,000,000, sent to overseas ports by water transportation.

One billion five hundred and eighty-six million dollars has been expended by the Federal Government on waterway transportation other than the Great Lakes, while at the same time only $194,000,000 has gone into the Great Lakes harbors and channels.

The Great Builder of the Universe intrigued the vision of mankind by the wonders of His creation and left a little obstruction in the St. Lawrence River, the doorway of the unsalted seas that leads down to the oceans of the world.

England has been the pathfinder of commerce and transportation from the beginning of the history of this globe on which we live. The great oceans were separated by a small strip of land in the desert of Egypt. England built the Suez Canal and the seven seas were united in commercial wedlock. The maritime business of the nations chartered its course and England became the "mistress of the seas" and ruled the waves. Cheap transportation did that.

Let us complete the 48 miles of canal in the St. Lawrence River, ratify a treaty with Canada, and this Nation will have a fair chance to recapture some of its lost export trade and extend to a third of our population an opportunity to compete in the markets of the world.

Let this great national and international question be reconsidered in the present session of Congress, and may the President ask the Senate to ratify the treaty with Canada in the hope that the dream of two centuries will become a reality.

Bacon said:

> There are three things which make a nation great and powerful—a fertile soil, busy workshops, and easy conveyance for men and goods from place to place.

This is the philosophy with which we as a nation must approach the treaty to complete the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway. [Applause.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIERMANN].

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, we hear a great deal about Government expenditures, balancing the Budget, and reducing taxes, but we may just as well make up our minds that we are not going to balance the Budget, we are not going to reduce expenditures materially, and we are not going to reduce taxes until we affect two items: One is paying for past wars and the other is preparing for future wars.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to some figures which to my mind are impressive. These are expenditures which Congress already has voted, or is pretty sure to vote, for the fiscal year 1937 for paying for past wars and preparing for future wars. I omit a number of items that could properly be included.

For the Veterans' Administration $753,000,000. Additional appropriation for the prepayment of the bonus, $1,730,000,000. The Bureau of the Budget estimates that the interest charge for the next fiscal year will be $805,000,000. It is fair to charge at least three-quarters of that to war, which makes an item of $600,000,000. The Army appropriation as it passed the Senate was $611,000,000. The Navy appropriation bill which we are now considering is for $532,000,000. The total of these items is $4,226,000,000. Until we can affect that item of $4,226,000,000 there is no use of this Congress talking about balancing the Budget or of reducing taxes. And I venture the prediction that the actual outlay for 1937 on past and future wars will be close to, if not actually, $5,000,000,000.

It would amuse me, if the thing were not so serious, to hear men on this floor talk about economy and reducing expenditures and spend perhaps a half a day talking about a $25,000 item. A few days ago we debated for 3 hours and we had two roll calls to decide whether or not the Black Committee should be represented in the Supreme Court by a $300-a-month lawyer or whether we should appropriate up to $50,000 for that purpose. We decided on $10,000. This afternoon, with a matter of $532,000,000 before this House, there are not 30 Members here to listen to the debate, and I presume that of the 20 or 30 who talk in the general debate on this Navy appropriation bill there will not be more than 4 or 5 who will say anything about the bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an observation?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I wonder if, in large measure, one of the faults is not that we are not expected to offer any amendments to appropriation bills that have been so carefully prepared in committee, and that when you do you ofttimes get so little sympathetic treatment for any amendment that, for all practical purposes, the Members feel it is fruitless to offer amendments to an appropriation bill, particularly if it is so effective as to go to the very vitals of the bill. Is that not true?

Mr. BIERMANN. There may be something to that. It seems to be taken for granted that every appropriation bill be passed as it is brought in. The Congress seems to have committed itself to the idea that we have to appropriate more than a billion dollars every year in the name of "preparedness." I should like to have some proponent of this bill tell us against whom we are preparing. I make the statement now that there is no proponent of this bill who can come into this House with a statement by any Army officer or any Navy officer submitting a plan, a supposititious plan or a fanciful plan or an imaginary plan, by which any foreign country or any combination of foreign countries would have any reasonable prospect of successfully invading America; yet we are appropriating over a billion dollars in the name of "defense." Defense against whom?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Would not the able gentleman state that the figure appropriated is at least twice as large as is necessary to defend our own soil? All I am interested in, if I may say it, is to defend our own soil. I believe, with George Washington, "Why stand on foreign soil?" Let us defend our own soil. A billion dollars is too much for that. We are getting ready to interfere in other wars elsewhere on other continents.

Mr. BIERMANN. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I understood the gentleman to ask who we were preparing against?

Mr. BIERMANN. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I recall that same question being asked Gen. Leonard Wood in Boston when he was making a preparedness address in 1916. The gentleman will note the date. He was asked who we were preparing for or against. His reply was that if you could tell him for what storm a captain prepared the ship when he left port, he would tell who we were preparing against.

Mr. BIERMANN. That was a very clever answer by Dr. Wood.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That was a year before 1917.

Mr. BIERMANN. Yes. It was a clever answer, but it was not a very sound answer, and it did not answer the question.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. No; but history answers the question which was asked of General Wood.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I agree with the theory of the gentleman from Colorado, but what we are dealing with is the specific question of how much we shall spend for what we deem adequate protection. On that subject we differ quite a bit.

Mr. BIERMANN. Of course, if we follow the suggestion of the gentleman from Colorado that we are going to have the same kind of an answer to my question as in 1917 was given to the question asked of Dr. Wood in 1916, then, of course, we cannot prepare too much; but I assume that this Congress is not going to entangle us in another war on foreign soil. The excuse for these appropriations is that we are going to "defend" our own soil from foreign attack. A billion and a quarter is too much money to appropriate for an attack from nobody, for the wildest jingo cannot tell us of any country that contemplates attacking us or of any combination of foreign countries that could successfully attack us. These appropriations cannot be defended as "defense" measures.

Mr. Chairman, our Army and Navy appropriations, assuming the Senate does not increase the amounts in this bill, and ignoring W. P. A. and P. W. A. and other funds that are going to the Army and the Navy, will be, for the year 1937, $1,143,000,000. This is $3,130,000 a day for the year. This Capitol building cost $15,000,000. In other words, for the money it will take to run the Army and the Navy the next fiscal year we could duplicate this Capitol building each 5 days.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point a short table of figures regarding the cost of some of the public buildings in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they the gentleman's own figures?

Mr. BIERMANN. They are figures I got from official sources, and I cite the sources.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The table referred to follows:

Archives Building	$8,549,703.85
Commerce Department	17,149,489.37
Connecting wing Labor-Interstate Commerce Commission	1,997,384.18
Internal Revenue Building	8,056,287.62
Interstate Commerce Commission	4,436,617.71
Department of Justice	10,214,108.45
Department of Labor	4,738,987.21
Post Office Department	9,280,455.62
Total estimated cost of buildings in triangle	65,951,433.64
Total cost of Treasury Building to date	8,260,635.04
Total cost of Capitol Building	15,000,000.00
Total cost of Library Building, including bookstacks, addition to library and auditorium	9,351,560
	98,563,628.68

(Figures in triangle buildings and Treasury Building are by Procurement Division of the Treasury Department. The other figures are by Architect of the Capitol.)

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. All the main public buildings we have in Washington, such as the Capitol, could be duplicated for the cost of about two battleships plus their auxiliary and protecting vessels, I believe. These great vessels in modern warfare, as stated by Admiral Sims, in command during the World War, will not be safe in the next war unless they are as far up the Mississippi River as we can get them. I have no objection to building efficient machines of war for defense, such as the aircraft submarines and light, fast surface vessels; but why build these obsolete monsters? Why, they are prehistoric.

Mr. BIERMANN. I feel the same way about the matter; but before we adjourn I imagine we shall have to pass upon the authorizing of the building of two battleships at a cost of about $50,000,000 each. In the report of this committee it is stated, on page 15, that "capital ships of 35,000 tons are estimated to cost upwards of $51,000,000 apiece." All the buildings in the Triangle here in Washington, according to the figures in this table, cost a little less than $66,000,000. In other words, for the cost of running the Army and Navy less than 2 months during the next fiscal year we could duplicate all the buildings in the Triangle.

Since the World War closed, that is, beginning with the fiscal year 1920, we have appropriated for the United States Army in round numbers $7,507,000,000; we have appropriated for the Navy, again in round numbers, $7,319,000,000; we have appropriated for those years, including the present fiscal year, $14,827,000,000. If the present bills for 1937 appropriations pass as they now exist, the total cost of the Army and the Navy since the close of the World War will be $15,970,000,000, and this does not include very substantial sums allocated to these departments by the various relief agencies. It does not, for example, include $160,000,000 allocated to the Navy in the one fiscal year of 1935.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield.

Mr. MASSINGALE. The gentleman stated that the cost of a capital battleship to the Government of the United States was about $51,000,000. Does the gentleman have any information on what the cost of a similar ship would be, say, to England or to Japan?

Mr. BIERMANN. No.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Is it not about half this amount?

Mr. BIERMANN. No; I do not think so. I have not the figures; but I recall in the debate on the ship-subsidy bill last year I asked the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] what cost of shipbuilding they were trying to equalize in that bill. I asked if they were going to equalize for the English cost, where wages were high, or the Japanese cost, where wages were low per day. We get utterly confused if we lose sight of the fact that labor costs and wages per day are two different things; but I asked him whether he was trying to equalize for the English cost or the Japanese cost. I expected him to say the Japanese cost, but he frankly told the House—and it is in the RECORD—that it costs less to build a ship in England than it does in Japan. So to take just wages per day to determine the cost of building a ship is not sound reasoning. Whether or not ships can be built more cheaply in England or Japan is a question I should like to have some member of the Committee answer, if he will.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. In connection with the gentleman's observation on a balanced Budget and a reduction in the cost of operation of the Military and Naval Establishments, has the gentleman any information or figures to show how much could be saved to apply toward balancing the Budget by reducing the personnel of the Army or the Navy or reducing the requirements of food, clothing, ordnance, munitions, and so forth, that are made by private industry? Has the gentleman figured how much this might add to the lines of the unemployed? I just wonder how much that amount would be that could actually be applied toward a balancing of the Budget.

Mr. BIERMANN. I have no figures on that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I wonder if it would be a great deal, as a matter of fact. I am quite intrigued with the whole idea.

Mr. BIERMANN. I cannot imagine that any reasonable excuse can be found for spending $1,143,000,000 in the next fiscal year on our Army and Navy in the name of "national defense." If we spent it in the name of offense it would be a different proposition.

Mr. Chairman, I have asked several proponents of this kind of expenditure to submit a statement by any second lieutenant of the Army, or any general, or the statement of any ensign in the Navy, or any admiral, as to how this country may be successfully invaded by any foreign power or any combination of foreign powers. I venture the assertion that the statement will not be submitted to the Members of this House. Then I want to lay this question also before the proponents of this bill. I would like to have them cite to this House one time in the past 100 years—and I will give them a little more time than that—a case where any belligerent power has been successful in landing from the water a hostile force on foreign soil. During the World War the Allies had the big navies of the world, yet they could not get close enough to Germany to fire a single hostile shot into Germany. Take the Turkish situation. After slaughtering thousands and thousands of allied soldiers they did get a little foothold, but they could not maintain the foothold. It is just not in the cards that any foreign country or combination of foreign countries can successfully invade this country, and I defy the proponents of this bill or any militarist or any jingoist in the House, if there be any, to propose any plan for invading this country and then get an officer of the Army or Navy to sign his name to it and say that it is sensible.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. LUNDEEN. The gentleman is making a very able statement, and I take it that the gentleman is not for stripping the country of its defenses?

Mr. BIERMANN. Oh, no.

Mr. LUNDEEN. The gentleman is merely advocating the defense of the soil of the country. The General Staff has repeatedly stated, through members of the General Staff, that this country cannot be invaded by a foreign foe. Japan is busy with Russia. England is busy with her troubles, and Germany and France are busy. What country is going to attack us? We might get into somebody else's quarrel, and I am going to say "No" to that as far as my one single vote is concerned before it is too late.

Mr. BIERMANN. I will gladly join with the gentleman.

I raise this question: What are we going to do with these battleships and this big Navy? In case another war breaks out in Europe, are we going to insist on defending our right to trade with a belligerent or with some neutral country through which the goods might get into a belligerent country? Of course, if we are going to insist on that, we may just as well make up our minds now that we are going to become entangled in the next European war. Are we going to insist on the open-door policy in China? Are we going to insist on Japan doing everything just the way we want it done? If so, we want the largest Navy we can support in order to maintain a war in Asiatic waters. But any responsible Army or Navy man will tell you this country cannot be invaded.

Mr. Chairman, I remember 34 years ago this fall being in Minneapolis, Minn., and listening breathlessly to Richmond P. Hobson making a speech in favor of a great Navy. He said that the need of a large navy was to repel a Japanese invasion. He had us all sitting on the edges of our seats. He stated that the invasion was not going to be 20 years hence nor 15 years hence, and we got further out on our seats and were more breathless; then he came down to 10 years, 5 years, and 2 years, and said: "It is not going to be 2 years hence." He stated that it was so near that our utmost efforts could not prepare us adequately against an invasion by Japan. This incident occurred in the fall of 1902, and the same kind of talk has been going on in this country in all of the intervening 34 years.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman is not insensible to the fact that if we encourage our people and our industries to carry on a commerce with all the countries of the world, certainly there are considerations which demand that we must put behind them whatever protection the Nation can afford to our commercial trading.

Mr. BIERMANN. But I do not believe that it is necessary to have a battleship accompany every trade ship around the world.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I agree with the gentleman, and I do not hold that view at all; but there are some things that we must bear in mind. We cannot say to this country and to its tradespeople and to the whole economic structure, "Now, go ahead and sell automobiles and typewriters in China, but if you do, you do so at your own peril." We should let them know in advance if this country is going to take that attitude, so that they may fortify themselves accordingly. I think that would be going pretty far, and I do not believe the gentleman would go that far.

Mr. BIERMANN. I agree with our very distinguished and able statesman, Cordell Hull, whom I look upon as one of the great men of this administration. He is building up a foreign trade effectively, and in doing so he declares he is laying the soundest foundation for peace. Peace is inclined to follow trade, I believe. Replying to the gentleman's suggestion that in case our people develop trade with foreign countries we should be prepared to defend that trade, I do not know how far I would go with that idea. In case the question rose as to whether we should send battleships over to defend our trade in China or pay the damaged tradesmen out of the Treasury, I would be inclined to make it good out of the United States Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. But we have not had that question determined as yet, and until we do, to follow the matter to its logical conclusion where we would get rid of our Navy entirely, the effect would be to say to our trades people that they carry on their international business relationships at their own peril and this would be going very far.

Mr. BIERMANN. Yes; and I am not here to decide all those questions, but I do not believe I would be quite willing to vote for any kind of arrangement that would make it necessary to send our boys to foreign countries to participate in disputes over there and get their eyes shot out or their legs cut off or their bodies destroyed and their future and the future of their families ruined because we had some trade with a country over there and insisted on protecting that trade regardless of the cost in American lives.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I agree with the gentleman, but I am wondering where we are going to draw the line.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from Arizona [Mrs. GREENWAY].

Mrs. GREENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate this opportunity. My remarks may be a little irrelevant so far as the Navy is concerned; but like my good friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], I have something in my system I would like to get out.

I have been wondering all week what the Nation thinks of the spectacle of our industrial leaders in meeting in downtown Washington and their Government representatives assembled in Congress considering and concerning themselves with the affairs of the Nation.

Before the chamber of commerce representatives arrived it was broadcast across the Nation that we people in Congress were vultures picking to pieces the sparrow of industry. I went down there and listened to the opening speech with interest and with hope. I listened to every word, and I have read it twice since. It was an extraordinary speech, moderate in its delivery, beautifully thought out, and remarkable in every way, but most remarkable in its omissions.

It described the freedom that industry in this country enjoyed in a not very far past. It then described the infringement of government in recent years on business. It then listed as detrimental to business and business recovery practically every major bill that has been passed by the Democratic Party in the last 4 years, and at no period in the speech, with one exception, did it mention unemployment or concede the reason why the Government had had to try to do something to take care of the unemployed in the United States, and that one instance in which it referred to the unemployed was the most remarkable part of the speech. I would like to know what you think of it. It said—you know I have not got so I can really call people by name and say mean things, because I am a little reluctant, so I say, "it said", I will not say "he said." [Laughter and applause.] It said:

> It is not enough that we simply show that the present financial policies of the Government are destroying the possibilities of a balanced Budget. The real job is to show the average American citizen that sound finance and a balanced Federal Budget are more valuable and vital to him and his children than any possible dole or bounty or hand-out which may be given to him, and which, in the very process of giving, exposes our whole land to the terrors and distress of inflation, repudiation, or confiscatory taxation.

It suggests that one of the objects of the chamber of commerce should be to develop public opinion in this country even to the point of making the man, woman, and child who is receiving food in the form of a dole from the country, know that he had best not receive it if it is necessary that the Budget be unbalanced that he receive it.

Is not this a remarkable thought? Think of the human being today who would believe that their Government should balance the Budget to the exclusion of giving him and his wife and child the necessities to exist. Mind you, there was no mention of meeting the problem of unemployment whatever or recognition that most of the laws which business believe detrimental were necessitated directly or indirectly to meet the unemployment.

I have inquired all week what will be the outcome of the activities of the chamber of commerce in a concrete purpose and result.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentlewoman from Arizona 3 additional minutes.

Mrs. GREENWAY. So far as I can learn, their principal objection is to concentrate upon counting the unemployed of this country. Why did they not begin to count the unemployed 4 years ago? The unemployed have been counted again and again and again. They have been counted by the United States Employment Office, by the American Federation of Labor, and by welfare.

I believe the chambers of commerce are dead right in saying that the fact that none of these counts tally does justify a recount and an honest analysis of what the condition is, but this is merely a first step—offering no remote solution.

I would have to stop now—am I going to have 2 more minutes?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I have yielded the gentlewoman from Arizona 3 minutes and I gladly yield 2 more minutes, if desired.

Mrs. GREENWAY. I thank you very much. I am grateful. I did not realize how long it took for a woman to talk.

By the way, I am so impressed with those people up at the chamber of commerce. They look like experts. They look prosperous. Their eyes are keen and quick, and I believe that having people like that who can create surpluses really is the greatest good fortune this country has, provided they share the responsibility of trying to work out a solution instead of just making tally sheets and criticizing the Government.

Now, let us get down to this end of Pennsylvania Avenue. Let us consider the tax bill. Directly and indirectly the meetings of both the chamber of commerce and the Congress this week have all had to do with unemployment and welfare. We passed a tax bill. In passing it the inference of this House was that we had waited on industry long enough. Maybe we were right; but what have we done if the bill remains as it was when it passed this House? Now, this is what I believe we have done. I believe we have taken from industry savings and thus crippled against future expansions and depressions the only vehicles through which classified employment can be efficiently given. We have taken surpluses created through thrift, ingenuity, and vision from practical and successful institutions, and plan to transfer it to departments for sustaining classified employment through artificial channels.

I do not believe anybody in Congress thinks that this country can continue to carry millions of people on welfare and not eventually run on the rocks. Business must believe this, too; but until industry, labor, and government concede and shoulder it as the problem that will, if not solved, change and destroy the character of our country, we can make no progress.

Why cannot those successful in business talk to us down here, and why cannot we talk to them? Why cannot they take some of these surpluses and give employment instead of necessitating their confiscation through taxation and futile and demoralizing use through this so-called welfare system, which by the very reason of its nature must not become a permanent institution?

I can vote against a tax bill that seems to undermine all the principles that have led to success, but I cannot sit by and see industry, which has profited in so many ways in the last 3 years, bemoan and deride the efforts of their own Government to devise ways for the less fortunate to sell their usefulness while they offer no concrete plan and apparently see no necessity for one.

Unless existing industry can be used to absorb the unemployed, the answer is Government interference. You have been very patient, and I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN].

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Chairman, one of the clearest concepts in American public opinion today is that we want no war. And most definite of all convictions is that America shall not engage in a war of offense. In their relationships with the people of other nations, the American people think only of peace. They do not think of war. The only act of violence which Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence condones is one of self defense—defense of self, home and family—and those in kindred situations. No other act of physical pursuasion or coercion is justified according to the professed standards of American civilization.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am informed that the bill before us proposes the largest peacetime appropriation ever recommended by a Committee on Naval Affairs for the consideration of the American Congress. I submit, sir, that a big appropriation presupposes a big Navy, and I submit further that a big Navy is by way of anticipation of a big war. There is no other use for a big Navy. But, Mr. Chairman, American public opinion today says that the only legitimate use for an American battle fleet is in the waters of the western continent. True, we sent a fleet to the other side of the world to engage in a battle in 1898. And thereby the United States temporarily became involved in a policy of imperialism which has been a source of expense and embarrassment from that day to this. If we should become involved in a military or naval encounter in that section of the world again it will come through some real or fancied insult to our sphere of influence in the Philippines. But, I repeat, sir, that American opinion will not sustain a war involving the Philippine Islands. The natives of the Philippines have pleaded for independence and they are in the way of attaining it. As soon as they get it, or before, Japan will take steps which will cause the Filipinos to call loudly for the support of the mother country. But our people will not support a foreign war. Why does Congress impose upon the American people the expense of preparing for a foreign war?

Mr. Chairman, it is only within the last few hours that this bill has become available for examination by the membership of the House. With the very limited opportunity which we have had to study the bill I would not presume to suggest to the members of the committee in charge that they strike out any specific item. But I do plead with the committee in charge, and with the membership of the House to pare down in some practical way, and in substantial amount, the staggering total of this appropriation measure. Let us, in fact, express by this bill that which patriotic citizens are constantly saying in their school assemblies, church gatherings, at the work bench and in the counting houses; namely, that America is preparing for peace and not for war.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAIN. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Would not the gentleman think the best place to cut expenses of the bill would be battleships and dreadnaughts?

Mr. MAIN. I think that is a practical suggestion.

A. A. Milne writes, "If you want peace, you must renounce the idea of war." But this legislation does not renounce the idea of war; it preserves, encourages, and develops the idea of war.

And if war should come again, Mr. Chairman, what are the possibilities or the probabilities? It is reliably asserted that the next war will be a war of chemicals and gases. Through clever propaganda, we were led to believe that the World War was a war to end war. Mr. Chairman, the next war, if it comes, will be a war that will end civilization.

Heretofore the menfolk of the belligerent nations have engaged in warfare, in trenches or on battlefields, remote from the centers of population. But a war conducted with chemicals, gasses, and airplanes will not be decided in favor of the Nation with the largest battleships or the swiftest cruisers. Such a war will be determined in favor of the Nation with the most ingenious chemists, the most intrepid aviators, and the most fiendish commanders. America has neither the cause nor the conscience to engage in that sort of human extermination.

This is the bill providing appropriations for the support of the Navy. The personnel of the Navy and all sea-faring men honor the tradition, in case of threatened peril, "Women and children first." Milne and many others say that the next war will be a war from the air in which every woman and child will be involved. There is no defense for these women and children except an attack which will involve the enemies' women and children.

Christianity has been maligned as a failure, but someone has said, with a taint of skepticism, that we cannot say Christianity has failed because it has never been tried; and, quoting Milne again, we read:

> There is one way, and only one way, to arrest this war; that is, to renounce war. I have suggested a method by which this renunciation might be made a reality. You will call it "impossible!" When we call a thing "impossible", we mean that it has never happened in our experience. A renunciation of war has never happened in our experience, and, therefore, any method of effecting it is "impossible" until we have tried it. * * * If the economic life of the world barely survived a war which it entered in a condition of health, it cannot, starting in its present condition of ill health, survive another war.

All the other considerations aside, Mr. Chairman, this country cannot stand the economic strain of another war. Fifteen or twenty years after an armistice has been signed some of the horror and cruelty of war may have been erased from our thoughts. We may even gloss over the fact that wars are futile and inefficient as a means of settling national and international difficulties. But the Members of this Congress are never permitted to forget the staggering financial cost of war. America simply cannot afford to go to war. War loans, pensions, claims, compensations, hospitalization, all combine to saddle the Nation with burdens of unmeasured magnitude and duration. Intelligent America must find the better way; and if all other argument falls, I repeat this challenge, and this warning, "Women and children first."

Mr. Chairman, I plead again with the membership of this House to amend this bill in some manner, and to such extent, as will definitely announce to our people and to the world that America is peace minded and not war minded. And as one of the opportunities to give evidences of the good faith and sincerity of our dedication to the cause of peace, I call again to the attention of the membership of the House the petition of the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. LUDLOW, now on the Speaker's desk, seeking to bring to the floor of this House for debate and action the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing that, except in the event of an invasion by an armed force, the authority of Congress to declare war shall not become effective until confirmed by a national referendum by the people who are going to provide the human material with which war is conducted.

And I further recommend and advocate for the serious consideration of Congress, H. R. 9134, sponsored by my colleague, Mr. BOILEAU, of Wisconsin. In the language of that bill, Mr. Chairman, it ought to be the declared policy of the United States to use the governmental powers of national defense for defense only. We ought to refrain from maintaining or establishing agencies of warfare other than those necessary for defense. America ought to fulfill the commitments of the general pact for the renunciation of war ratified by the Senate in 1929. It ought to be the settled policy of this Congress, in connection with every appropriation bill, to renounce war as an instrument of national policy. And we ought to adjust the military system of this Nation to harmonize with the policy of the pact for renunciation of war. We ought to maintain a defense policy designed only to defend the boundaries of the Nation against invasion. And we ought to eliminate from the defense establishments all such agencies and activities as are designed and primarily useful only for aggressive or foreign warfare. And, Mr. Chairman, in further harmony with the provisions of H. R. 9134, we ought to divorce our thought from the psychology of war by abolishing the Department of War.

It may be important to change the name of the Department of Interior to that of Department of Conservation, but I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is infinitely more important that we abolish the Department of War and merge the activities of that Department with the Department of the Navy and all air forces, and transfer them to a new department—a department that by its very name typifies and signifies American thought and attitude—the department of national defense.

Why, Mr. Chairman, under the present system these Departments actually compete with each other in the markets for supplies and equipment. We ought to put a stop to the spectacle of one department of Government bidding against another department maintained for the defense of the Nation. Under the proposed reorganization it will be possible to coordinate the purchase and production of military supplies. Economy, efficiency, common sense, and real patriotism all join in the argument for appropriate name and coordinated authority for the department of national defense.

But, sir, I would not have my plea for a reduction in the sum total of this appropriation bill interpreted as an argument against preparedness. One of the outstanding organizations in the land for the training of youth has for its slogan "Be prepared", and nations, like individuals, must be prepared. But the temper of America does not point toward preparedness through the medium of junkerism or professional militarists. America does not look to the professional soldier or sailor to control its military or naval policy. To prove this, we need only cite the fact that in the President's Cabinet the ranking heads of the military and naval departments are invariably chosen from civilian life. Real preparedness in America—and the potential protection which America needs—rests with the Officers' Reserve Corps, the National Guard, the United States Naval Reserve, and the United States Marine Corps Reserve. And to that end I recommend for the early consideration and serious attention of Congress, House bills 11681 and 11682, introduced by our colleague, Mr. MAAS, of Minnesota. These bills provide for the reorganization, administration, and maintenance of the United States Naval Reserves, the United States Marine Corps Reserves, and for other purposes.

In supporting these measures I join in the sentiment recently expressed by the resolution of my comrades in the General George A. Custer Post of the American Legion at Battle Creek. And I join with the gentleman from Minnesota in asserting that the civilian reservist, trained for defense, is the best guarantee of our safety; and that such reserve force, on the other hand, contains no military threat to the peace of the world. The reservist has everything to lose and nothing to gain by war, but he makes the most effective defense force because he is able to effectively fight when and if an emergency should arise. Well-trained reserves are the cheapest and most effective defense forces. And men of that type, sir, will never stimulate or encourage a war of offense, nor one to be conducted on foreign soil. [Applause.]

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO].

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, we find that for this year, when we add what we are going to appropriate by means of the bill under consideration to what we have already appropriated for the War Department, we shall have appropriated over a billion dollars for war purposes. Not only do we appropriate a billion dollars for war purposes under the guise of national defense but we find today in this bill a surprise appropriation of approximately $104,000,000 for the building of two additional battleships, for which there has been not a single iota of evidence adduced at the hearings on this bill. This item was put in about 2 days ago without a hearing or study.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Yes.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Would it not be a good deal better, before we spend $104,000,000 on two battleships that no one seems to be able to show the reason for building, to take care of the veterans and the widows and the orphans of the last war? And if the gentleman will permit, on November 11, 1928, President Coolidge said that when the last veteran and the last widow and orphan shall have been taken care of because of the last war the last war will have cost the United States more than $100,000,000,000.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I think the gentleman is correct. So that we are confronted with a situation of $1,000,000,000 for war purposes and an additional $100,000,000 for two battleships, about which no member of the committee knew anything until 1 or 2 days ago, without a single word of testimony attempting any justification for this insane expenditure. The minutes of the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations are barren of any reason for this additional appropriation.

We increase appropriations for war on one hand, and on the other hand we find that, while we appropriated $4,800,000,000 last year for unemployment relief, this year, dealing with practically the same situation, there has been recommended only $1,500,000,000 for unemployment relief. The argument is advanced by the spokesman for the administration that the reason why we are appropriating only $1,500,000,000 is that it is assumed that private industry will absorb a large number of these unemployed. Whether or not private industry will absorb these remains to be seen; whether or not the problem is as simple as that also remains to be seen. Technological displacements and other economic factors cannot be left unconsidered if you want to solve the problem. If private industry does absorb a large number of unemployed they will be employed at substandard wages.

Force employment at substandard wages and you destroy the much-vaunted American wage structure. Destroy the wage structure and you will increase the number of unemployed. The most important issue before the people is to put the unemployed back to work at a living wage. One step in that direction is the 30-hour week without reducing wages. Until then the most important immediate issue before the American people is that of caring for the unemployed. Despite the false optimism emanating from the Department of Labor, we still have 12,626,000 unemployed. This figure is conservative. It was compiled by the conservative leadership of the American Federation of Labor and released by it on March 2, 1936. It also stated that the month of January 1936 showed an increase in unemployment of 1,324,000, the largest since 1931. Its comment was "to lose ground to such an extent at this time is nothing short of tragic." Therefore the "recovery is here" ideology upon which the President's recommendation for only $1,500,000,000 for unemployment relief is based is unrealistic. The dismissal of 700,000 workers from W. P. A. is based on the same artificial and wishful premise. The money-saving, cruel, chiseling devices employed by the local relief bureaus, such as in New York City, at the expense of its staff and clients is in accord with this false policy. The New Deal relief program today is not much different than that of Herbert Hoover in 1930. Mr. Hoover attempted to solve the problem by waiting for Lady Prosperity to come from around the corner. The New Deal is trying it by proclaiming loudly and smilingly that she has kept her date and is now promenading with the president of the chamber of commerce along Main Street. Mr. Hoover then contended that very little should be expended for unemployment relief. The New Deal relegates unemployables to local charity, professes his desire to care for the employable unemployed, but refuses to continue to provide for the 700,000 of them today and many more tomorrow.

It also has refused to provide for those who have become in need of W. P. A. employment since November 1, 1935. Those who will remain on W. P. A. will continue to be the recipients of the un-American security wage. So that, despite the fact that an appropriation of $4,800,000,000 was found to be entirely inadequate to deal with the problem of 12,000,000 unemployed during the fiscal period of 1935–36, the President now asks for only $1,500,000,000 to deal with a similar situation for the fiscal year 1936–37. This is the sum recommended by the reactionary National Economy League. It constitutes a sweet victory for the Liberty League over the unemployed. The American Tories have cause to rejoice, since their views on relief, recommending cuts in relief appropriations, are now being adopted by the New Deal. The New Deal fights the Liberty League by making faces at it and uses words. In deeds it surrenders. Hence, as for the unemployed, the New Deal has substituted in the place and stead of the Hoover fantastic myth of two chickens in every pot the stark reality of two wolves at every door.

In the face of this appalling situation the unemployed can expect nothing from those in power. They must depend on themselves, on militant labor organizations, and on all liberty-loving Americans. They must organize American public sentiment behind a genuine relief bill.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The gentleman speaks of recovery. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that one-fifth of the families of the United States are today living on an income of $1.36 a day, another fifth on a daily income of $2.72?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I am also aware of the fact that 22,000,000 persons in the United States are still dependent on public charity in some form or other. They are dependent on either starvation direct-relief budgets, or on starvation security W. P. A. wages. I do not claim recovery. The New Deal does. You have no recovery while 22,000,000 exist in such a condition.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Where would they be if the present administration had not engaged in the humane policy that it has?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. You should ask me where would the administration be. The unemployed owe the past appropriations to their own mass pressure. It is true that the administration made appropriations in the past. However, they were inadequate. Everybody connected with relief or W. P. A. Administration knows it. If those appropriations were adequate, why are you now discharging 700,000 persons from W. P. A. rolls? I voted for the $4,800,000,000 bill. I agree it was better than nothing; but at the same time the present administration is retreating. Why appropriate $4,800,000,000 for 12,000,000 unemployed in 1936 and ask for only $1,500,000,000 for 1937 with the same number of unemployed? Yet we appropriate over one billion for war.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Not with the purpose of entering into a controversy with the gentleman—I respect his views too much, and with many of his views I agree; but in addition to the $1,500,000,000, there is probably, as I understand it, a billion and a half dollars available from the $4,800,000,000.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Assuming that figure to be correct, the fiscal year does not end until June 30, 1936. We start to spend the new appropriation of $1,500,000,000 on July 1. How much will be left by July 1 of that other $1,500,000,000 we do not know. In fact, the discharge of 700,000 from W. P. A. proves that you are running out of funds. Therefore when we add what will be left, if any, on June 30, 1936, to the proposed $1,500,000,000 the sum will be much below $4,800,000,000.

Mr. McCORMACK. I agree; but the gentleman will agree with me that with the proposed appropriation of a billion and a half dollars there is a large sum left from the $4,800,000,000 which will be utilized. Whether or not that will satisfy the demand, I shall not pass on.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The sum remaining must be insufficient to last until June 30, otherwise why are you discharging 700,000 men from the W. P. A.?

Mr. McCORMACK. I cannot agree with that.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. And you are also refusing to take on the W. P. A. roll persons who became eligible for W. P. A. after November 1, 1935.

Mr. McCORMACK. May 31, too, and those who are on relief, but I will say to the gentleman that in connection with the dead line I am in agreement with the gentleman on that. I have recently addressed a letter to Mr. Hopkins, as I have on several occasions in the past, stating that that dead line should be eliminated, and I am hopeful that it will be.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The difference between the gentleman and me is that the gentleman prefers to be hopeful with reference to relieving the unemployed, and I believe in having the Congress of the United States take action for unemployment relief now, to appropriate sufficient to do away with dead lines, and reemploy those who have been discharged.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Just for a question.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman apparently is entering into a controversy with me which does not exist.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. No. I did not intend to enter into any controversy with the gentleman.

Mr. McCORMACK. I simply, for the RECORD, wanted to show that the $1,500,000,000 limit is greater than that which was used last year.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Not by any means. The gentleman will admit that it is not equal to $4,800,000,000.

Mr. McCORMACK. Oh, yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. For the unemployed who honestly want to work and cannot get it, I think the Government, and all of us, are deeply sympathetic, and we will do all we can for them; but for the organized unemployed, who organize to cause trouble, and who do not want to work, and would not work if they could, but who organize to create trouble, I do not think the Government ought to show them any consideration whatever, and when they take charge of a State capitol, like they did at Trenton, N. J., I think they ought to be put out bodily without any consideration whatever.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I expected that from the gentleman. However, despite the gentleman from Texas, the unemployed have a right to organize and will organize. He reminds me of a queen of France some time ago who said, "The people have no bread. Let them eat cake." It perfectly describes the gentleman's attitude toward the unemployed.

Now, to continue, 700,000 workers are being discharged from W. P. A. Nobody who was not eligible for relief prior to November 1, but who became eligible for relief after November 1, is taken on W. P. A.

You can talk all you want to about industrial recovery. You can talk all you want to about financial recovery, but when you go back to your districts this year you are going to be confronted with the unemployed in your district. You can show them the stock-market sheets and you can show them the increases in prices, but they will ask you: "How can you vote for increases in naval and military appropriations and at the same time vote for decreases in appropriations for the unemployed in your own district?" That is a question which you must face and is a question which you must answer.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. The gentleman certainly does not want 22,000,000 of our citizens continued upon relief?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. No; I do not.

Mr. SHORT. Well, if the $3,300,000,000 granted to the President in the Seventy-third Congress plus the $4,880,000,000 given him at the first session of this Congress has failed to take those people off of relief, how in the world does the gentleman think they can be taken off of relief by continuing these expenditures?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. The difficulty with the present administering of relief is that you do not give to the unemployed sufficient to give them purchasing power. What you give them is a security wage, from $19 to $94 a month; very few received $94. The average in my city is $55 a month on W. P. A. All they can purchase is slum shelter and a starvation diet. The same applies to those receiving direct relief. They have no purchasing power. If you, as a military man, were going to capture a fortress, and you needed four regiments to capture that fortress, you would not send one regiment at a time against that fortress but you would send the entire four regiments at one time.

In dealing with the problem of unemployment we never appropriated sufficient funds to give the unemployed any purchasing power. That is why the unemployed are in no better position today than they were before. Today they are in worse position, because today the friends of the forgotten man, while they make faces at the Liberty League and chambers of commerce, are in retreat. For approximately the same number of unemployed you are appropriating much less than before. If in the past we had given the unemployed sufficient to maintain themselves in health and decency, they would have had a purchasing power. Using this power, the wheels of industry would have been moving on a larger scale than today. However, we would still have had many unemployed. In the past with the end of the crisis we had few unemployed left during the period of so-called recovery. Today the residue of unemployed is so large that, despite financial recovery, the unemployed remain our most important problem. Why? Is it the fault of the unemployed, or is it due to an inequitable and unjust economic system which must be overhauled? Would the gentleman refuse to give shelter and food to the victims of this system simply because the system forces them to remain idle?

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Would the gentleman be frank in expressing his opinion of the Hoover administration in making no appropriations for the unemployed?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. It was absolutely wrong, and you are beginning to reach Mr. Hoover's position. He said, "We will solve unemployment by waiting for Lady Prosperity to come from around the corner and keep her date." She did not come. You are saying the same thing. You are saying that she is here. She is going to meet the president of the chamber of commerce, but despite that, you still have 12,000,000 unemployed, and you now propose to cut relief appropriations to a bone.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I have been authorized by the gentleman from Michigan to grant 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York, provided he will yield for one other question.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman who gave me the time.

Mr. SHORT. The gentleman from New York, of course, is aware that the President of the United States has emphatically said that the problem of unemployment must be solved by private business. This administration strangles private business to death at the very time it demands that business hire the unemployed.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I disagree with the gentleman on the question of private business. I think we have been too lenient with private business. I voted for the tax bill, but I did not think it went far enough. It was a cream-puff, milk-toast tax bill. Furthermore, we should not dodge the responsibility; the problem cannot be solved by private business. It must be solved by the Representatives of the American people in Congress.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does not my friend put himself in a rather inconsistent position where he denounces and criticizes the Hoover administration for its failure to assume the proper leadership, and at the same time criticizes the Roosevelt administration for giving proper leadership with reference to relief?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. You have not given proper leadership with reference to relief. The fact that you have discontinued Federal direct relief; the fact that you are now throwing out 700,000 persons, and the fact that those who remain must exist on security wages and starvation budgets proves poor leadership.

Mr. McCORMACK. We have given $3,000,000,000 a year.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. That is not enough. Now you appropriate only one billion and a half. You started in the right direction. Now you retreat. What kind of leadership is that?

Mr. McCORMACK. It is $3,000,000,000 a year more than Hoover gave.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Is the gentleman proud of being just a little bit better than Hoover? Is that all the gentleman has to offer? [Laughter.]

Mr. McCORMACK. It is $3,000,000,000 better.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. And now it is only $1,500,000,000 a year better. Tomorrow it will be less. The day after you will give as little as Mr. Hoover. If you can do no better than that for the unemployed in the country, the unemployed will have a perfect right to consider the New Deal in Mr. Hoover's class next November.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the gentleman be kind enough to favor us with any plan he has to offer to solve the unemployment problem, briefly? How would the gentleman solve the unemployment problem if he were President?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. As a Member of Congress I introduced a bill which has been endorsed by respectable organizations as well as other organizations which might not be considered respectable by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] because they are organized unemployed.

Mr. BLANTON. No.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I decline to yield, Mr. Chairman; I decline to yield, and ask that this interruption be not taken out of my time. The gentleman [Mr. FLETCHER] asked me a good question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I asked my question seriously; I should like to know.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Answering the gentleman from Ohio, I desire at this time to recite the salient provisions of my bill.

It is based on the following six principles: First, the unemployed are victims of an unjust economic and social system which has failed and are without work due to no fault of their own, and that the general welfare of the American people depends on the welfare of the unemployed; second, therefore they should not be treated as objects of charity, but as a matter of right should be given work at a living wage during their period of unemployment, and as a matter of right the unemployables should be furnished relief on the basis of a minimum necessary to maintain life in health and decency; third, the burden for accomplishing these objects should be borne by those who have profited from a system which creates unemployment; fourth, the unemployed are to participate in the administration of work and direct relief; fifth, something should be done toward a permanent solution such as reopening and operating shut-down factories by and for the benefit of the unemployed; sixth, State and local funds are inadequate, and Congress should make adequate appropriations.

Accordingly, my relief bill provides for an appropriation of $6,000,000,000, $2,000,000,000 in grants to States for direct relief, $2,000,000,000 in grants to States for State and local work projects, and for projects required for the operation by States or municipalities of abandoned factories, mines, and other enterprises for the purpose of providing employment and producing goods for use. None of these funds are to be used for financing privately owned enterprises. Two billion dollars for the continuance of W. P. A. The six billion dollars shall be expended for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937.

The bill also provides for certain standards. The relief standards guarantee sufficient and nourishing food, decent housing, appropriate clothing as to season and comfort, medical and dental care, replacement and renewal of essential household goods, carrying charges on homes owned by relief clients, provided such charges are not in excess of rent allowance; the maintenance of relief clients' membership affiliations in his religious, fraternal, political, or social organization; necessary transportation and communication expenses. All those who do not receive an income from any source equal to the minimum standard established in his locality as necessary to maintain life in health and decency for himself and dependents would be eligible for relief. Those who receive an income less than such minimum would receive the difference. All payments are to be in cash. No such person shall be disqualified because of sex, race, color, creed, citizenship, residence requirements, political or labor affiliations, refusal to work at occupation for which he is not fitted, refusal to work because of a strike or lock-out, refusal to work at substandard conditions of hours and wages, or refusal to work where he is required to scab or join a company union.

It also provides for standards on work projects, such as prevailing wages, but in no case shall weekly compensation be less than the minimum necessary to maintain life in health and decency for the worker and his dependents, 30-hour week, collective bargaining, workmen's compensation, work at one's own trade and according to his skill, and no discrimination. Preference would be given to those projects which would be of a permanent and useful nature.

All persons unemployed and capable of work would be eligible for work on these projects.

The relief and work projects would be administered by a commission of 15—5 to be unemployed, appointed by the President from panels of names submitted by organizations of unemployed, 5 from panels of names submitted by social workers, and 5 from panels of names submitted by the Works Progress Administration.

No State would be given grants unless it had adopted relief and work projects standards and plans conforming with those set up in the bill. The commission would pass on the plans of the various States before allocation of funds were made to them. The States, in addition, in order to qualify, must set up State and local boards giving the workers and relief clients one-third representation. The local committees shall fix minimum standards for the locality, and a dissatisfied worker or relief client may appeal to the local committee and may make a final appeal to the State committees.

The administering of the Federal work projects would be in the hands of regional and local committees giving the workers one-third representation. The local committees would fix minimum standards. Again dissatisfied workers may appeal to the local committees and may make final appeal to the regional committee.

The usual question will now be asked, Where are we going to get the money? Many sources exist. Reduce to a minimum the more than a billion dollars appropriation made for war purposes. Apply the British tax rate on all individual and corporate incomes, inheritances, and gifts over $5,000 a year. This source will be more than ample.

This bill, in my opinion, meets the immediate demands of the unemployed until such time as the Frazier-Lundeen bill for social insurance is adopted.

This bill is now before the Committee on Labor and we intend to hold hearings on it beginning the 4th of May. The day is not far distant when the Marcantonio Federal relief and work projects standards act will be considered a conservative bill by Members of this House.

Mr. BIERMANN. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. H. R. 11186.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Would not the gentleman also say that social-security measures should be gone into further?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Yes. The social security plan adopted just places the burden of caring for the poor on the shoulders of the poor. It does nothing for the present unemployed and acts as an impediment to genuine social-insurance legislation. As I see it, the only real social-security bill is the Frazier-Lundeen bill. This bill gives the people genuine social security and puts the burden where it belongs—on the wealthy. Now, I should like to complete my statement.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman grant me further time?

Mr. SHORT. Yes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Then I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. Does not the gentleman also feel that if we returned relief agencies to the various States and local communities that the cost of administration would be cut in two; that whereas many white-collar Government parasites are fattening off the taxpayers under the present system, the people on relief would receive more than they are now getting?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The only difference there would be to substitute local politicians for politicians from Washington.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I should prefer to see the administration of relief placed in the hands of a body made up of representatives of three important groups. The welfare group should be represented, the Government should be represented, and there should be representatives selected by the President from panels of names submitted by various organized unemployed, of whom the gentleman from Texas is so afraid.

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BIERMANN. I understand the gentleman would have the Government appropriate money to put people to operating the closed factories. Where would the gentleman sell the stuff that these factories made?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. We would produce it by the unemployed and for the use and benefit of the unemployed.

Mr. BIERMANN. The gentleman would sell it to the people who made it?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Not necessarily. We would sell their products throughout the country. In other words, you are producing for use instead of profit. We are bound to come to it sooner or later.

Mr. BIERMANN. Would the gentleman operate a typewriter factory that way, or an adding-machine factory that way?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. We can always exchange commodities; sell these commodities and use the proceeds for the benefit of the unemployed. That has been done before.

Now, coming back to the Navy bill, I want to say a few words. The reason I spoke of the unemployment problem and the inadequate appropriations therefor was simply because of the fact we are appropriating over a billion dollars here for war purposes. Over a billion for death and inadequate funds for the unemployed. In addition to that we are appropriating several million dollars for the purpose of building two battleships. I wonder, and I am suspicious, what funds are going to build the keels of the battleships? Are they going to be built out of W. P. A. funds or out of funds appropriated by this body? I think that is a question that should be taken up and answered when debate is confined to the bill tomorrow.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. They will build a great number from funds appropriated by this body, and they will build some more out of W. P. A. funds.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Then we are burying the forgotten man under the keels of battleships. You are using his only too inadequate funds for this purpose.

In conclusion, I want to make this one statement: I am not a fanatical pacifist. I believe in defending the United States, and, if necessary, if the time should ever come, I would not hesitate to do my share of the fighting in the defense of our country. But why spend this amount of money when you cannot even identify the enemy that will invade the United States. If we are not preparing against an invasion, what are we preparing for? Are we preparing for another imperialistic war? Are we preparing perhaps for another war to end wars or for a war to make the world safe for democracy?

Mr. Chairman, why are we building all of these ships? Why are we appropriating over a billion dollars for destruction? Where is the enemy? Can anyone mention the enemy? I challenge any Member, whether he be a member of the Military Affairs Committee, the Naval Affairs Committee, or the Appropriations Committee, to reveal to us the enemy that is going to attack us.

Mr. BLANTON. I accept the challenge and can mention an enemy if the gentleman will yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I know what the gentleman is going to say. He is going to holler "red"! He reads "red", he dreams "red", he sees "red" all the time.

Mr. BLANTON. I have a pretty good reason for all of it.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The gentleman cannot give a good reason but his usual laughable charge.

Mr. BLANTON. The speech the gentleman is making is a pretty good reason.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. My speech is a good reason to prove that the gentleman's views on this subject are silly.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, without mentioning any nation, the gentleman realizes that unfortunately causes of war are in existence everywhere. Every other nation of the world is apparently preparing for war. Of course, I condemn it just as much as the gentleman does, but it is going on just the same.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Is anybody preparing to invade the United States?

Mr. McCORMACK. Well, every other nation is preparing.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. But not to invade the United States.

Mr. McCORMACK. The causes of war are in existence, and no one knows where it may come from.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. All we should be concerned with is an invasion of the United States.

Mr. McCORMACK. We do not know when it is going to start. The gentleman knows as well as I do that a navy has to be built before a war occurs. You cannot build a navy overnight.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. We have heard that argument for the last 35 years. We have heard about Japan and everything else, and on this pretext we have appropriated millions of dollars, and now we are going to spend more than a billion dollars for war. We are preparing for war and we will have war, a war, not in defense of our homes, but an imperialist war, a war to insure our financial and imperialistic interests. I shall never vote for such a war as long as I am a Member of Congress. It is over a billion dollars for war, while 700,000 W. P. A. men are being discharged from the rolls. How can anyone justify the expenditure of a billion dollars for war while at the same time 700,000 men in the United States of America are being kicked off the W. P. A.? That is the question that the unemployed will put to you in the next elections in this country. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK].

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include certain excerpts.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

REPUBLICAN PARTY GETS A FASCIST WHAT-HAVE-YOU "BRAIN TRUST"

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I am very much worried today because I note some little dissension among my Republican brethren. They seem to disagree on various things. But something is going to come into their lives which will banish their bickerings and disagreements. It is a "brain trust" of their own which they have gone out and hired. Is not that wonderful, after shouting against our "brain trust", and abusing the Democrats for 3 long years? What is this Republican "brain trust" for? I will tell you.

This morning I did not sleep very well, so I got up and read the Hearst newspaper. I saw in the Merry Go Round column a story about a professor by the name of Thomas N. Carver, who appears to be the head of the Republican "brain trust", and its best thinker. Then I sent out and got the Philadelphia Record and read that newspaper, and in the Washington News this afternoon I see there is another story. The Merry Go Round, widely read American column of national news, is by Drew Pearson and Bob Allen, and the story in the Philadelphia Record, giving more details, is by Bob Allen.

It seems the Republicans and their shiny new "brain trust" have got some big ideas, and stranger or more eccentric ones were never heard before. I gather this from reading what they have to say. Here is what these brain trusters are for: In the first place, they are for nothing. That is, they are for nothing that is progressive, intelligent, or constructive in America. Then they are for everything that is reactionary, and then they are for being "yes" men for the utilities, the banks, the munition makers, and the big corporations. Then they are for setting class against class; I mean, the big property owners against ordinary humanity, ordinary Americans.

DON'T MIX REPUBLICAN BUNGLER FLETCHER WITH OUR DEMOCRAT OF SAME LAST NAME

I am now going to read some of this matter that came from the newspaper. It is pretty tiresome to read, but it explains the Republican mind and is good reading, is swell reading, because it shows just how stupid the Republican leadership is. They have what they call a National Bungler, who is Mr. Fletcher, and he went out and hired this "brain trust."

Mr. FLETCHER (interjecting). Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman give the full name—Henry P. Fletcher—not BROOKS FLETCHER?

Mr. MAVERICK. I shall be pleased to see that that is done. I will see that the name of the National Republican Bungler is not mixed with yours, BROOKS FLETCHER, a good Democrat of Ohio. [Laughter.] Our Democrat, BROOKS FLETCHER, is the opposite of the Republican one in every way.

Mr. DREWRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. Of course I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. DREWRY. I was just wondering why a good Democrat should object to the stupidity of a Republican leader.

Mr. MAVERICK. Well, I just want to call it to the attention of the American people. When I said I was worried I may have been a little sarcastic; but I do not object. You see, we have been accused for 3 years of having a "brain trust", so they went out and got a "brain trust." But it turned out to be a second-hand "brain trust", a sort of empty-headed outfit and a sort of reactionary one. In other words, they copy us, the Democrats. Imitation is a high type of flattery, but the imitation comes late, and is not up to quality. Let me read what this story says, and this is really a serious sort of thing. From the Philadelphia Record of April 30, 1936, we read as follows:

Big headline: G. O. P. brain truster's Fascist plan would limit marriage and relief.

Subheadlines: End of regulation over business among proposals of Harvard professor in economics. Sterilization of unfit, birth control, and immigration ban urged to end labor oversupply.

And here is the article. I am reading:

[By Robert S. Allen]

A program of pronounced Fascist character is being advocated by a leading member of the recently organized Republican "brain trust."

He is Thomas Nixon Carver, professor emeritus of political economy at Harvard University, and his extraordinary policies are contained in an 84-page booklet entitled "What Must We Do to Save Our Economic System." It has been privately circulated among business leaders.

This particular booklet, though there are others worse, by the same author, was published through a Fascist, big business group out in Los Angeles. Their main ideas, according to the headlines, and as I read the booklet, are forced sterilization and birth control, and an immigration ban; and to bring prosperity back to the country this Republican "brain trust" is not going to allow anybody to get married unless he first owns an automobile. Yes; this is how the Republicans are going to bring us back prosperity. Just make them all buy automobiles before they let anybody marry. First you must own an automobile and then the stock owned by the Du Ponts in General Motors will go up; Mr. Raskob will feel good; Al Smith will smile; everything will be fine; and the depression will thereby be over.

It says among other things that they would have an immediate curtailment of relief, and then the article continues:

"Lauding theories advocated by Hitler and Mussolini", who are the new gods of the Republican Party—

The Republican "brain truster" proposes that the following program be adopted by the "substantial people of America"—

Only the substantial people, you understand, are Republicans—"'the real forgotten men' (the spokesman and head brain truster for the Republicans says) to combat New Deal measures and policies."

REPUBLICAN "BRAIN TRUST" TO TURN BIG BUSINESS LOOSE ON COUNTRY; NO LABOR LEGISLATION

So I read the program of the Republican "brain trust":

1. Relaxation or elimination of Government regulation and restraints on business.

What they in effect say and really mean, is to leave business entirely without any control, have no labor legislation, no old-age pensions, no social security legislation—just let business alone and do not charge them any taxes. This is their idea of bringing back prosperity.

G. O. P. TO LET THEM—WHAT—STARVE?

Now, let me read the second one.

2. Drastic curtailment of unemployment relief with the jobless needy "forced off (relief rolls) by severe regulations," if necessary.

I understand in this Fascist organization out in Los Angeles they had a lot of conversations that they kept secret and never allowed to be printed. This booklet is one that they revised down, that is, with a lot of their more brutal suggestions cut out in the printing. The implications, however, are there. They do admit, however, relief is to be stopped by "severe regulation." There is a lot of hidden meaning and brutality in that.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. It seems to me that the proposal to which the gentleman from Texas properly objects follows the Administration's own policy as enunciated by the President of the United States a year ago in January when he declared that the Government "must and shall get out of this business of relief." If quoted correctly, your so-called "Republican brain truster" is only echoing the words of the Democratic President of the United States.

Mr. MAVERICK. We hope to cut it down, but we are not going to do it in the way that this man advocates, which is to let the people starve.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. The President said that that would be done as quickly as the economic circumstances would permit.

Mr. MAVERICK. I thank the gentleman; that is correct.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. We cannot accept that explanation because the language of the President's message does not bear out what the gentleman from Massachusetts has stated.

THIRD BRAIN PLANK—NO AUTOMOBILE; NO MARRIAGE

Mr. MAVERICK. The third one suggested by the Republican "brain trust" and I presume approved by the Republican Party:

Sterilization of the "palpably unfit", use of birth control, limitation of marriage to those who can afford to buy and maintain an automobile, and exclusion of all immigrants in order to reduce the oversupply of labor.

I understand in these meetings in Los Angeles the participants went considerably further than that in their philosophy, and their intended plans on the American masses. I mention this to show the arrogant attitude of this Republican professor, and how, of course, his views met with the approval of the Republican Party, or he would not have been employed.

Now, we have been accused of regimentation of the economic life of the Nation, but it seems to me that the Republicans now want to go out and regiment family relations.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. These "brain trusters" want to do a lot of things that no one in the Democratic Party ever even thought of. When the whole story is told it will be shocking to some and funny to others. I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. But this so-called "Republican brain truster" is only echoing what has been proposed in bills introduced by two distinguished Democratic Members of this body, the gentleman from Oregon, Mr. PIERCE, and the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. GASSAWAY.

Mr. MAVERICK. Oh, they are fine gentlemen, but that has not been adopted by our "brain trust" or our party. That has been adopted by the gentleman's party. Moreover, your brain-truster apparently wants to force this upon the American people. He and his crowd of "supermen" will decide who can live, and who can, in his own words, "spawn."

G. O. P. BRAINS ADVOCATE FORCE OF PROPERTIED CLASSES AGAINST HUMAN RIGHTS

Now, the fourth point in this Republican platform, which is blue-printed for them by the Republican G. H. Q., is as follows:

No. 4. Organization of the propertied class in a party to put over this program.

That is the real idea. It is to set class against class; to use the force of property against humanity. That shows a fundamental difference in the economic, political, and social philosophy, of the two parties. This is for the purpose of setting up the propertied class against the ordinary average Americans who live in this country. The Republican Party represents centralized property and finance; the Democratic, the rights of the average man.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes.

Mr. LUNDEEN. When property rights and human rights conflict, human rights must prevail.

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes; of course. I thank the distinguished gentleman.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman distinguish clearly between property rights and human rights? The gentleman must see that property as such, being dead and inanimate, can have no rights, but that the right to acquire, own, and use property is one of the most valued of all human rights.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I hope my friend from Texas will not let this red herring which the gentleman from Minnesota is attempting to draw across the trail divert him from what he is talking about——

Mr. MAVERICK. The red herring which the Republicans are drawing across themselves with their own "brain trust" is worse; I shall not let him divert me.

(The gavel falls.)

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 minutes more.

REPUBLICAN PARTY BENDS KNEE TO LIBERTY LEAGUE

Mr. MAVERICK. I just want to say in reply to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHRISTIANSON] that the Republican Party is backed and controlled by an organization known as the American Liberty League——

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The head of the American Liberty League is a good Democrat.

Mr. MAVERICK. Quondam, or ex-Democrat; now reactionary hired hand of the munitions interests and in his spare time a reactionary boss of the Republican Party. Furthermore, we do not acknowledge him any more. But, to go on, the Republican Party bends its head to what they call the American Liberty League. But the American Liberty League is not for liberty. They say they are, but they are for property. And that isn't all; they are for the big-propertied class, for the monopolists, and for property being owned by a few, with human rights made subservient. And I agree with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHRISTIANSON] that ownership of property is a valuable human right, but the Liberty League is only for that for themselves. I believe, however, that there should be a wide distribution of property.

HOSTILE AND SELFISH INTERESTS FINANCE MOVE

I continue reading the article by Mr. Allen in the Philadelphia Record:

Mr. Carver's name is on the cover of the pamphlet, but on the inside page are the names of three sponsors: Harold L. Doolittle, chief consulting engineer of the Southern California Edison Co.; Franklin Platt, an insurance company official, and Ernest Carroll Moore, vice president of the University of California, at Los Angeles.

In a foreword by these sponsors they reveal that Carver formulated his platform in collaboration with a large group of California bankers, utility officials, and business executives.

In his pamphlet Carver holds that the chief economic problem facing the country is unemployment. This is due, he contends, to an oversupply of labor. To remedy this he proposes what he calls the alternative to unemployment relief, viz, birth control, sterilization, restricted marriage, elimination of immigration.

Get this: the matter of birth control and sterilization is apparently not advocated even to the extent of permitting it voluntarily, but to impose it by force upon the people of the United States. That is the idea of the Republican "brain truster" employed because of his ideas.

Here is more of the program mapped out for the Republican Party by their "brain trust", which I continue to read:

Pending the operation of these measures, he proposes in the meantime to give business its head by curbing or eliminating Government regulation, balancing the budget and stopping "tinkering with our monetary system."

He also advocates cutting taxes, but would continue public works of a permanently useful nature. None of the Government's projects, however, would be of a kind to compete with private industry. Publicly owned power plants would be taboo.

This, in effect, would mean that the great T. V. A. development would be turned over to big business as a gift from the taxpayers; big business would profit from it, but the taxpayers would have to foot the bills. As for reforestation, prevention of soil erosion, and all the great reclamation, conservation, and drainage projects, the ordinary citizen would have to pay for it too.

REPUBLICAN "BRAIN TRUSTER" ADVOCATES "POPULATION PLANNING"

The story continues:

Carver lays great stress on his fear of a Communist revolution.

"The trouble has always been that economic planners have wanted to control the symptoms rather than the causes of the disease that afflict the body politic", Carver writes. "In all this welter of discussion of economic planning, scarcely a word has been uttered on the important subject of population planning.

"Yet the population problem is fundamental, and the most dangerous form of laissez faire is that which leaves the quantity and quality of our population to blind forces which are cruder and more dangerous than so-called blind economic forces."

It is presumed some high council will decide who is intelligent and who is not. And then, it seems, people who are not intelligent will be prevented from "spawning."

"So long as people who lack intelligence continue to spawn others who lack intelligence we shall have more of such people than we can possibly employ at good wages."

Carver voices a low opinion of the present reproductive processes, which, he says, are initiated by "the emotions, the passions, and the ignorance of men."

He explains that in the past strong races have taken care of their population by imperialistic territorial expansion.

"Strong races have, in the past", he declares, "solved the problem of maintaining a favorable man-land ratio by taking more land when they needed it. They at least had far-reaching plans for the solution of the fundamental problem of the man-land ratio.

"In this respect they were, on the intellectual, if not on the moral, side far ahead of any of our present-day economic planners outside of Italy, Germany, and Japan."

DUCE AND HITLER NOT SO BAD

While insisting that he abhors any governmental scheme which interferes with the freedom of the individual, Carver intimates that Mussolini and Hitler may not be as bad as painted. After all, he says, are they not the foes of Communism?

He predicts that "hungry hordes from Russia, gazing covetously across their borders at countries blessed with capitalistic plenty, will some day invade Europe."

"Europe will once more stand with her back to the Atlantic, fighting for its existence against the hordes from the East", he says. "Possibly Mussolini and Hitler are more far-seeing than the rest of us and are prepared to stand together at another field of Chalons as the ancestors of their people did in A. D. 451, who knows?"

Carver expands on his encomiums to Hitler by contending that the Nazi Fuehrer did the "rational" thing of segregating and sterilizing congenital defectives.

The United States could solve its unemployment problem, Carver says, by also engaging in a policy of imperialistic territorial expansion. He admits sadly, however, that Americans as a whole seem "especially unfitted, both by geographical position and temperament, for a career of expansion by conquest and colonization."

FINDS MENACE IN THE PEOPLE

He warns, however, that "propertyless masses" may have no "moral scruples" against such adventures.

"The landless and propertyless masses of Europe and America may find it easier to take land from their richer fellow citizens than to take land from weak races in distant parts of the earth", Carver says, adding that this is a suggestion which "property owners would do well to ponder."

The brain truster does LOT spare the goose-flesh of his businessmen sponsors in any portion of his pamphlet. Speaking of the possibilities of violent revolution, he says:

"The law of proletarian revolution is startling in its arithmetical simplicity. Where manual workers become overwhelmingly numerous they will have both the motive for revolution and the power to carry it through to success."

Carver ends his booklet with a call to action. He pleads with the "substantial people" to organize and defend their rights.

He suggests that it might be possible to "persuade the perplexed masses that they have more to hope for under our system than under any other."

WHICH ARE THEY, CRACKPOTS OF RIGHT OR LEFT, OR JUST PUZZLED?

Mr. MAVERICK. There is an article in the Washington News this afternoon written by Ruth Finney, showing that this Republican brain truster is vague in his thinking and does not know what he is talking about. I understand that his views were all discussed by the Du Ponts and Henry P. Fletcher, the National Republican Bungler, and Republican leaders before they hired him, so they knew and accepted what he stood for. But among other things, Carver, the brain truster, is against the tariff. He says that it is wrong, that it is improper to have a tariff, but he is narrow-minded enough on other issues, so he passed muster with the big boys who own, operate, and finance the Republican Party.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield 2 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MAVERICK. Let me read a paragraph from a story in the Washington News:

To cap the climax Carver disapproves of the keystone of the Republican Party, the protective tariff. It is an erroneous policy, he says, because it diverts labor into inefficient industries. He adds: "We cannot safely trust too much economic power in the hands of one individual."

CONTROL MONOPOLY—REDISTRIBUTE WEALTH—WHAT'S THAT?

Here are some more paragraphs in the news showing his views:

There are three kinds of income, Carver says, "earnings, stealings, and findings." Under earnings, he classifies wages paid for productive labor, interest on one's own accumulations, and profits on business which one manages honestly.

Stealings he lists as burglary, swindling, deception, chicanery, mendacity, and monopoly. Findings he calls mineral wealth, rise in the site value of land, and inherited wealth.

He favors proceeding, by legislative action, to redistribute all unearned wealth, and he outlines three steps toward this end—increased taxation of land values, a graduated inheritance tax, and control of monopoly prices.

WHAT DO THE REPUBLICANS STAND FOR?

He does not seem to know what he is talking about.

What I want to show to this Congress and to the people of the United States is this, that the Democratic Party offers an integrated, intelligent plan for the recovery of this Nation. But the Republican Party offers absolutely nothing—not a single idea or achievement.

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic Party at least has courage to act, to do something. Night and day for 3 long years we have been damned because we are alleged to have "brain trusters" in our administration. We admit we have some men with brains in our organization; we admit we have got brain trusters with us. And as far as I am concerned, I want to make the observation that it seems to be the settled policy of the Republican administration to get the weakest men in Government service and to have the brightest men in big business, and then it is much easier for big business to control the Government. Personally, I am proud of this Government and believe that we should get the most intelligent and best educated men in the country to serve it, and we need brains more now than ever before. The Republican Party saw that the old story about brain trusters was not going over so well, so they went out and hired some of their own—making themselves illogical and ridiculous, and at the same time, really did not get men with brains or progressive spirit, but most of them labor-hating, reactionary yes-men with vague and conflicting ideas.

My hope is that every American citizen will look forward to giving his children university educations—and of making brain-trusters out of their sons. I would like my son to be a brain-truster. I would like my son to have a trained brain and to use it for the benefit of his country. And just by way of a side remark, I had rather he used his brains for peaceful purposes than to have them shot out in a war.

There seems to be a disposition on the part of the Republicans to back everything that is brutal and stupid and cruel. They have worked all this in with the Liberty League; the Republican Party has become merely a subcommittee, without voice or vote, for the Liberty League. Meek submission to the Liberty League is all the Republicans offer the American people. They appeal to prejudices; they yell loudly when the Democrats offer anything constructive, talk vaguely of economy; do nothing, say nothing, and amount to nothing. The Democratic Party has made many mistakes, but it has attempted to give a progressive and intelligent administration to the people, with human thought and human rights predominating in thought and action. And believe me, that will be continued until we reelect Mr. Roosevelt in November—and then we'll keep on. [Applause.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. BANKHEAD.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the gentleman from Texas, Mr. MAVERICK, has adverted to what the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHRISTIANSON] called so-called Republican "brain trusters", and in view of the fact that the Democrats were very much criticized for calling into consultation a few college professors, I desire to incorporate in the RECORD a few of the names of the heads of that organization, although there are 59 of this group of so-called Republican "brain trusters."

Dr. Saxon of Yale; Dr. Bullock of Harvard; Dr. Carver of Harvard; Dr. Hobson of Wisconsin; Dr. Tucker of Columbia. They got after us a good deal for getting Dr. Tugwell from Columbia and now they have imitated us as nearly as possible by getting a Dr. Tucker from Columbia; Dr. Bradford of Lehigh; and Dr. Carpenter of Buffalo. I think the names of these distinguished "brain trusters" ought to be embalmed in the Record for the benefit of posterity. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MAVERICK. Embalmed is right. They are dead intellectually and need it. I understand they tried to get jobs with the Democrats but they were so inefficient and ignorant that we would not hire them. [Laughter.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the common report. I do not know whether that is true or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. I also want to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to a little pamphlet which has issued for the first time by the Republican National Committee, a pamphlet numbered 1, volume 1. I wonder if that is the product of this new "brain trust"? The title is "On Our Way." It constitutes about the cheapest kind of ward politics that could be conceived in any man's mind, put out by any cheap politician. I have shown it to my friend.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from Minnesota referred to it as "the so-called brain trust." So it has developed that they do not have any brains.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I ask the "brain trusters" on both sides, how are they going to put 12,000,000 men back to work?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman has not referred that question to me. I can answer it, but, of course, if he prefers the "brain trusters" to answer it, I will let them do it.

I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I was going to make the observation that I hope that other members of the so-called "Republican brain trust" do not hold the views quoted by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MAVERICK. Oh, you cannot make any excuse like that; no, sir. Do not talk about Tugwell any more.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Because if they do, then I as one Republican would have to demur, for those views too nearly coincide with those which have been enunciated by the present Democratic Administration and its leaders in Congress.

Mr. MAVERICK. Oh, that is a poor excuse.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE].

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak this afternoon about the 10-percent profit limitation amendment placed on the War Department appropriation bill on February 14. If the Members will give me their attention for just a minute, I believe I can call to their attention some important facts that should be taken into the consideration of the conference report that is to be considered next week.

TEN-PERCENT PROFIT LIMITATION FOR NAVY

Just to briefly refresh your memories concerning this 10-percent profit limitation amendment, let me say you will remember that more than 2 years ago a similar 10-percent profit amendment during debate in the House was placed on the Vinson-Trammell Naval Act, limiting all ship and naval-aircraft construction profits to 10 percent. Under the law it is the duty of the Internal Revenue Department to prescribe rules and regulations for the enforcement of this profit limitation, and this has been done.

This amendment has been working satisfactorily, as shown by the Navy Department and Treasury Department records. According to the report filed today by Senator WALSH, of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee, reporting favorably H. R. 5730, he indicates this profit-limitation amendment, effective since March 27, 1934, has not worked any hardship on anyone, in making this statement:

CONTRACTS MADE UNDER EXCESSIVE-PROFIT PROVISIONS

To date there have been 637 contracts with a total contract price of $229,352,577.40 entered into subject to the provisions of the Vinson-Trammell Act. The reports received to date following completion of the contracts total 82, of which 7 show profits in excess of 10 percent, totaling $13,716.84; and 24 losses totaling $197,609.74; the remainder of 51 showing a profit of 10 percent or less.

It will be remembered that, separate and apart from the construction program carried in the regular appropriation bills of the War and Navy Departments, which totals over $1,000,000,000 for these two Departments for this year, that these two Departments have received from the Public Works Administration the past 3 years the sum of $304,846,741.50, as follows:

Public Works Administration—Allocations to the War and Navy Departments, 1933–36

[Accounts and deposits, Feb. 18, 1936]

	Fiscal year 1933	Fiscal year 1934	Fiscal year 1935	Fiscal year 1936	Total War:
War Air Corps (airplanes)		$7,500,000			$7,500,000.00
Seacoast defenses		6,994,000			6,994,000.00

Watertown Arsenal			$89,000		89,000.00

Equipment			2,309,491		2,309,491.00
Motorization		10,000,000			10,000,000.00
Subtotal		30,494,000	2,768,491		33,262,491.00
Navy:

Vessels [1]	$238,000,000				238,000,000.00
Subtotal	238,000,000	32,980,762	331,535	271,953.50	271,584,250.50
Grand total	238,000,000	63,474,762	3,100,026	271,953.50	304,846,741.50

[1] Statutory allotment.

Thus we may better realize the enormous sums of money now being expended by these two departments. Then we refer further to the favorable report of Senator WALSH, and we find this statement concerning the $238,000,000 P. W. A. ship-construction program, to say nothing of the other ship-construction appropriations made in the regular appropriation bills. The report of the Senator says:

None of the contracts for the construction of complete naval vessels subject to the provisions of the Vinson-Trammell Act have been completed to date.

Thus we find no ship-construction company has yet made any income-tax return on ship contracts since the enormous ship-construction program of this administration has begun that has had for its purpose to bring the Navy to full treaty strength. This raises the interesting question of the conditions under which these ship-construction contracts were let. I find in turning to pages 55–56 of the preliminary report of the Senate munitions investigation report, this colloquy when Mr. John P. Frey, president of the Metal Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor, was testifying:

Mr. FREY. When Mr. Wilder was at my office, some 10 or 12 days before the bids were opened, he made the statement that he could give the names of the yards who would be the lowest bidders on all of the category of ships to be contracted for. I told him that was interesting. I had heard so many rumors about various things since I had been in Washington that I had to have something more substantial than that before I would give it any consideration. He said, "I will give it to you now, and I will seal it." * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Let the record be clear. The sealed information was given 10 days before?

Mr. FREY. Yes; about 10 or 12 days before. Three days before the bids were opened I was in General Johnson's office discussing the Ship Building Code and my own impression as to the intention of the shipbuilders, and I said: "They are all in collusion." I was talking then about the code. I said, "I think they are also in collusion so far as the bids for these new vessels are concerned."

I said, "I have had given to me a list of names of the shipyards who would be the lowest bidders for one type of vessel."

I said, "It is here in my pocket", and I took it out and I said, "Here, you take this. This will be interesting to you."

Johnson said, "That is too hot. I am not going to get mixed up in anything of that kind. I have got troubles enough of my own."

And General Johnson refused to take the sealed envelope. A great deal was going on at that time to occupy my interest, and I put the envelope in my desk. The day after the bids were opened and the bids published in the daily press I called Mr. Calvin into my office and said, "Let us find out whether Wilder was filled with hot air or whether he really knew what he was talking about."

Mr. FREY. * * * We opened the envelope and we checked them off and Mr. Wilder was accurate in every instance. He had named the lowest bidders.

Senator VANDENBERG. Who were the three lowest bidders?

Mr. FREY. There were submarines to be built, and destroyers to be built, and light cruisers, and armored cruisers, and aircraft carriers.

Senator VANDENBERG. Who were the successful bidders which Mr. Wilder identified?

Mr. FREY. There I have to depend on memory. I believe that the Bath Iron Works, the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Co., the New York Shipbuilding Co., the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., and I think there may have been one other.

In any event, as we checked up, we find that the statement which Mr. Wilder had given to me 10 days before was right.

Senator VANDENBERG. Did you mention Bethlehem?

Mr. FREY. Yes. Afterward I asked Mr. Wilder how he could give us so accurately the information, and his reply was perhaps characteristic. He said, "I have been in the game myself."

He was president of the New York Shipbuilding Co. for a while.

Senator VANDENBERG. How many ships were involved in this contract letting?

Mr. FREY. All of the ships that were contracted for under the original $238,000,000 appropriation.

Senator VANDENBERG. It was a large number of ships?

Mr. FREY. Yes.

Senator VANDENBERG. Thirty-odd ships?

Mr. FREY. Yes, sir.

Senator VANDENBERG. In various tonnage categories?

Mr. FREY. Yes, sir; from submarines to aircraft carriers.

Senator CLARK. The Bath Iron Works got one or two, Mr. Frey?

Mr. FREY. I think they secured two.

Senator CLARK. A very small proportion of the whole?

Mr. FREY. Yes.

Senator VANDENBERG. And with respect to all this diversified contractual structure, all of these various types of ships, Mr. Wilder's estimate as to the prophecy of who was to get the same, made 10 days before the bids were opened, proved scrupulously accurate in every respect?

Mr. FREY. In every instance. I forgot to mention that—and Mr. Calvin has refreshed my memory on this—that the Federal Ship Yard and the United Dry Docks were also bidders and also secured contracts at that time.

Mr. Wilder, who submitted in advance of the bidding in 1933 a list of low bidders to Mr. Frey, testified that the prearrangement in 1933 was known also to potential subcontractors:

Senator CLARK. Referring again to this transaction in 1933, Mr. Wilder, when you supplied this list to Mr. Frey and Mr. Calvin, you say that that was a matter of general information at that time?

Mr. WILDER. Yes, sir.

Senator CLARK. Will you describe a little further what you meant by "general information"?

Mr. WILDER. General knowledge would be a better word.

Senator CLARK. General knowledge?

Mr. WILDER. Yes, sir. Such people as the Chicago Pneumatic Tool, Westinghouse, or any large corporation that is supplying the shipbuilders knew what the arrangements were.

Senator CLARK. What were the arrangements?

Mr. WILDER. Knew where to look for the business.

Thus we find not only fraud and collusion among the ship contractors on arranging who would be high and low bidders, but this information, it seems, was known to the subcontractors as well who would furnish most of the technical equipment and material for use of these ships.

We find Mr. Wilder further testified how he happened to get hold of the confidential information (p. 57, preliminary Munitions Committee report):

Mr. WILDER. Now, if the Senator will permit, the reason I got that information was because the shipbuilders are reported to have had one whale of a row, and as a result of that row, this row being in the week prior to July 26, 1933——

Senator VANDENBERG. You mean the "big three" had a row?

Mr. WILDER. The "big three" had a row, and how. You had Charley Langell on the stand the other day. If you call him again, ask him what happened; why it was necessary for him to go out of the conference room and telephone Camden and urge Ernest Cornbrook to get in a plane and come right down.

Senator CLARK. Who is Ernest Cornbrook?

Mr. WILDER. Operating vice president of New York Ship. Bardo was getting the worst of the argument. Langell is the estimator. Langell had sense enough to go out and fly down. That was a week prior to July 26. It was reported that the row was so severe that Mr. Cornbrook had a heart attack at 4 o'clock in the morning and was taken out on a stretcher at the Mayflower Hotel. That was Thursday or Friday before the bids were opened.

Senator VANDENBERG. That is, at a meeting, an all-night session in the Mayflower Hotel, between the representatives of the "big three" a week before the bids?

Mr. WILDER. The week before. I cannot place it exactly.

Senator VANDENBERG. The week before the bids?

Mr. WILDER. The week before the bids, Thursday or Friday. Mr. Ernest Cornbrook flew down, and then at 4 o'clock was taken out on a stretcher. It was reported to me that the subject of the row was that Bethlehem would not accept the fighting ship and wanted something more out of it in addition. That was the reason.

Senator VANDENBERG. What else was reported out of the meeting?

Mr. WILDER. That is all.

Senator CLARK. Was this before the bids were filed?

Mr. WILDER. Before the bids were opened. It was on the basis that Bethlehem get one 8-inch-gun, 10,000-ton cruiser and 4 destroyer leaders of 1,850 tons; New York Ship, two 6-inch-gun, 10,000-ton cruisers and 4 destroyer leaders of 1,850 tons; and Newport News, 2 aircraft carriers.

Senator BONE. The bids had not yet been filed?

Mr. WILDER. No, sir.

Senator BONE. Manifestly, you could not have an understanding of that kind without knowing the attitude of the Navy Department, because it involved two different parties.

Mr. WILDER. That is just what I wanted to clear up Senator Clark on. This had nothing to do with awards. This was the filing of the bids.

Senator BONE. I understand, but the award is the important part. If they were made in that way and there was collusion, the Navy Department would have to be a part of it.

Senator BARBOUR. Awards can only be on the basis of a bid.

Senator BONE. I understand that.

Senator CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I am glad Senator BONE brought that up. Assuming collusion on any bid, the method by which that would be determined would be for the party selected by the conspirators to make the low bid and for the other parties to the understanding to make so-called protective bids?

Mr. WILDER. Yes, sir.

Senator CLARK. Sufficiently higher so that the selected party would necessarily be the low bidder. Is not that the customary method Mr. Wilder?

Mr. WILDER. Yes, sir.

Senator VANDENBERG. In other words, if at that midnight meeting it was decided that Bethlehem is to get—what does Bethlehem get?

Mr. WILDER. One 8-inch-gun cruiser and four destroyer leaders.

Senator VANDENBERG. All right. If they decided at that midnight meeting that Bethlehem is to have that particular group of ships, then Bethlehem bids low on that group, and the other two bidders bid high. Is that the way it works?

Mr. WILDER. Yes, sir; that is the way, the explanation of the 1933 situation.

Senator BONE. That is the explanation I wanted.

Senator VANDENBERG. Then to reciprocate Bethlehem bids high upon whatever ships are allocated to the other builders?

Mr. WILDER. Yes, sir. They faced a rather definite situation there.

Senator BONE. They were parceling the country out? "All Gaul is divided into three parts."

Mr. WILDER. Oh, yes; it is just the "great divide." They are quite accustomed to that in Bethlehem. They used to do it, and called it "Bonus Hill."

The testimony of Mr. Frey and Mr. Wilcher as shown by the munition hearings was rather fully verified and substantiated by documentary evidence and statements of others placed in a position to know the facts.

Profits on ship construction before 10-percent limitation amendment.

Before the 10-percent profit limitation amendment was offered and approved on March 27, 1934, we find these same ship contractors making these admitted large profits:

	Dollars	Percent
Cruiser Augusta (Newport)	2,800,945	35
Cruiser Houston (Newport)	2,800,945	35
Cruiser Chester (New York Ship)	2,946,706	36.9
Cruiser Northampton (Bethlehem)	2,200,000	25.4
Cruiser Indianapolis (New York Ship)	3,007,049	33.4
Cruiser Portland (Bethlehem)	2,058,796	21.8
Aircraft carrier Ranger (Newport News)	3,050,000	23.1

Last year the lobbyists for the ship contractors and scientific-instrument concerns in particular came before Congress with the above-described legislation practically to nullify or repeal the Vinson-Trammell Ship Authorization Act by excepting practically all of the firms that operated under it, as shown by the provisions of H. R. 5730. That legislation passed the House by a few votes. On a motion I offered an amendment to strike out the enacting clause, and a change of eight votes would have defeated it. I believe we would have been able to defeat this legislation had we been given equal time in debate and had we been able to thus present the full facts concerning this matter before the House.

So, we now have this situation existing: The 10-percent-limitation amendment as it applies to all ship and aircraft construction for the Navy is in the law today, and the Treasury Department has provided adequate regulations to make it effective.

TEN-PERCENT PROFIT LIMITATION FOR WAR DEPARTMENT

As to the War Department appropriation bill, the amendment that was unanimously adopted by the House, thoroughly understood by the committee, was taken out in the Senate as shown by the RECORD, largely, I believe, by misinformation given the Senate concerning the fundamentals of the amendment. I refer you to my speeches on this subject of February 18 and March 23, also the Senate hearings upon the Subcommittee on Appropriations. The 10-percent amendment, as I understand it now, has been taken out by the conference committee in its report which will be given to the House next week. I am taking this opportunity to call your attention to some of the reasons why I believe this amendment should be placed back in the War Department bill to put them on an identical basis with the Navy concerning similar purchases of aircraft and ship procurement.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I yield for a question.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Would it not be better if we had Government ownership of the manufacture of munitions? And let me add that I am in agreement with the gentleman on his 10-percent proposition.

Mr. McFARLANE. I should like to see that on all war munitions supply; but until we can get that, we should properly curb the exorbitant profits now being made by these different concerns, all of whom are practically owned and controlled, directly or indirectly, by the Chase National, National City, and the J. P. Morgan group——

Mr. LUNDEEN. I agree with the gentleman about that.

Mr. McFARLANE. Until we can bring that about it is up to us adequately to limit the profits these different concerns are making. I have here a chart which I inserted in the RECORD, Seventy-third Congress, second session, page 4977, showing the interlocking set-up of the aviation industry, which shows this entire industry is just one big family largely owned and controlled by a very few big Wall Street bankers. I inserted this chart and another one in the record of the hearings of the Naval Affairs Committee in 1934, and it has never been successfully denied. These two charts show the complete interlocking set-up of the Air Trust and show also these three financial institutions practically completely own and dominate the entire aircraft industry.

Until we can better control this situation and stop these enormous profits I say we should at least limit their profits to not to exceed 10 percent. Let me briefly refer to the reasons given by General Craig and Assistant Secretary of War Woodring as to why this 10-percent amendment should be taken out of the War Department appropriation bill. This 10-percent-profits amendment was taken out by the Senate.

WAR DEPARTMENT'S OBJECTIONS ANSWERED

They say first that it will greatly delay procurement. This is not true, as shown by the records of the Departments themselves. The Navy has operated efficiently under the Aircraft Act of 1926, even though they have not followed it and have made very little attempt to, but they have made a much better showing than the War Department has, although they are deliberately violating the law every day in their purchases. Now, if Congress is going to say, "All right, boys, we will take it your way"—and that is what the Congress is doing if they allow them to get by with this—then, that is that; but certainly these Departments cannot show any records to justify it. The Navy Department operating under the 10-percent limitation is far ahead in their procurement methods.

The second objection they raise is that it will stifle research and development. To the contrary, that is not true. The system they are now using in both departments is stifling research and development. The Aircraft Act of 1926 was designed to encourage research and development. For example, this act, section 10 A to E, provides how open competition shall be had through advertising in at least three leading aeronautical journals prior to letting any contracts for new designs of aircraft or aeronautical parts or accessories. Then when the winner of this competition is determined under section 10 K the law provides how the new design shall be builded into the new planes. And Congress year after year has appropriated millions of dollars for the War and Navy Departments for this research and development work. Then, whether the experimental plane is purchased under section 10 A to E, open design competition, or section 10 K, experimental model, either domestic or foreign, purchased without competition, the Government is then ready to consider quantity purchases, if needed. And under the law, if and when followed, it provides clearly how the Government shall pay for all research and development.

However, under the systems of procurement set up by the War and Navy Departments, the plain letter of the law is not complied with, and the Air Trust merchants apparently have their own way under the procurement set-up in effect, which makes it greatly to their advantage to be able to furnish the complete airplane on the line for test, knowing that if with their pressure they can put over the sale, that regardless of merit they will get plenty of allowance or leeway given them for supposed research and development work, and this to be taken into consideration in the consideration of their contract bid.

Under Mr. Woodring's view on the line complete airplane test system, what chance does the inventor or small airplane manufacturer have? The answer is none. The big Air Trust manufacturer submits his new dressed-up model with its few little new frills on it, and regardless of the real merit of the planes in this kind of competition there is nothing to keep the departments from buying whatever plane they please. And the Comptroller's office has repeatedly called these matters to the attention of the War and Navy Departments, and has pointed out to them the weakness of their own weak, improvised systems—set up by them apparently to knowingly and willfully violate the procurement laws. The War and Navy Departments are deliberately violating the procurement law and have done so ever since 1926. I have shown by the Comptroller's records where they have done that year after year—see pages 10034, 10043, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Seventy-third Congress, second session—and they are doing it now.

They have failed to follow the law, and I have made speeches on the floor at different times, for instance, on February 18 and March 23, this year, in which I put the facts in the RECORD, pointing out same. No one can stand on this floor and by the Government records deny those facts. They are true.

PROFITS ALLOWED IN ENGLAND, FRANCE, AND ITALY

Now, the question the Congress should decide is, What are you going to do about it? England, France, Italy, and other major powers have held that 5, 6, and not to exceed 8 percent is a handsome profit to give these concerns on production contracts, and that is the maximum amount those countries allow.

ADMINISTRATION FAVORS PROFITS LIMITATION

This administration, I know, agrees with that proposition. I am not their spokesman, and I do not claim to be, and I am not quoting them, but I remember the battle the President made as Assistant Secretary of the Navy to curb these war-material profiteers and how he tried to hold down their profits.

EXPERIMENTAL-RESEARCH EXPENDITURES

I will put in the RECORD the facts showing how much we have spent year after year for experimental work in the Navy Department.

The Congress the last 10 years has made the following appropriations for the Navy for experimental work:

Fiscal year:	Amount
1926	$1,674,277
1927	1,664,364
1928	1,640,844
1929	1,966,113
1930	1,807,034

Fiscal year—Continued.	Amount
1931	$1,991,092
1932	2,107,971
1933	1,985,975
1934	2,197,558
1935	1,820,597
1936 (to Mar. 16, 1936)	1,591,827
Total	20,447,652

Mr. Chairman, we are spending a tremendous amount of money to carry on this experimental and research work, in both the Army and the Navy and associated departments, and the Government, not private industry, is directly taking care of all that expense. In addition to that the National Advisory Committee on Aeronautics is spending, and has spent year after year, according to the figures I have, large sums of money annually for experimental work which they carry on largely for the benefit of the Army and Navy, and indirectly for the benefit of the Air Trust. In 1935 the Army spent $4,541,799. This bill carries an appropriation of $4,865,293 for experimental work. This is supposed to take care of their experimental work. There is no question about that.

WAR DEPARTMENT SYSTEM STIFLES RESEARCH

It is said that if this money is not appropriated it will stifle research. This research is stifled by the system under which they are operating, as above pointed out, and by the system which these prominent divisions of the War and Navy Departments have set up. Let me quote from Mr. Woodring's testimony as he gave it before the Senate Appropriations Committee on March 3, 1936. Here is what Mr. Woodring, in part, said (see pp. 22–31):

In looking up the law some 2 years ago I found that we were not carrying out the law, the Defense Aircraft Act of 1926, in the method in which we were procuring our aircraft, and as you know—you have heard a lot about it—we changed from a negotiated contract to a competitive bidding basis, which I think conscientious opinion holds is according to law.

The second thing that I have in mind was that we would, in changing to a competitive method of procurement, that we would transfer from the Government bureau, from a Government bureau, and Government civil service, and Army men, at Wright Field, we would transfer from them the development in engineering, designing, and possibly construction of airplanes over to industry, where I think it rightfully belongs.

I am against the Government being in business, in the manufacture of any of this business, especially of airplanes. The competitive method of doing business puts the responsibility of design and progress of military aircraft in the hands of the industry. * * *

The second phase of my change was to put this procurement responsibility and the progress of military aviation upon industry.

Further, in explanation of the procurement policy installed, Mr. Woodring said:

The House Military Affairs Committee have conducted a detailed investigation into Army aircraft procurement over this same period, and my office in collaboration with this committee have worked out a policy of procurement which has been in effect some 20 months and is definitely producing the desired results. * * * Now the system is becoming effective, and this year we will have over 500 modern airplanes delivered, and they, I want to say to you, are the finest airplanes that any country has in military aviation. I believe they are 2 years in advance, in progress, of any other military arm of government.

So that now Mr. Woodring describes his procurement system built up as follows:

The bidder is required to submit with his bid a completed airplane on the line for test, as he submits his bid, and these airplanes are thoroughly tested and contracts awarded to the manufacturer who has produced the finest performing airplane, after we have evaluated all the planes in competition.

To insure the reasonableness of the cost a careful financial audit is made of the cost figures of the manufacturer, after we make an award. This policy is resulting in a constant striving on the part of the manufacturers to offer better and better performing aircraft. It places squarely on the shoulders of industry, where it logically belongs, the necessary research and development work and gives the Government the active use and benefit of all the brains of the industry.

For instance, we will send out invitations for bombers for delivery in 10 or 12 months, and probably three different concerns scattered well over the United States to bid on bombers. Certainly under that kind of a system the companies are going, with their engineering and designing and researching departments, are going to try and build, develop and build, and deliver on the line the finest bomber in order to win the competition and therefore get the business.

Certainly it can thus be seen from the system set up by Mr. Woodring that research and development is being stifled, and under his system the little fellow and independent inventor do not have a chance.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. McFARLANE. Secretary Woodring stated further:

Assistant Secretary WOODRING. I feel that competitive bidding is now giving the Government adequate protection as well as resulting in marked improvements in aircraft performance, and as a further precaution the Army Air Corps carefully audits the books of the manufacturers under the now-existing provision of the Aircraft Act of 1926.

Senator COPELAND. In that audit, Mr. Secretary, is the Department going into the question of salaries of officials and that sort of thing?

Assistant Secretary WOODRING. I believe the salaries paid to officials is left out. We go into the costs of labor. We go into the actual cost of the airplanes, leaving out overhead. I think every factor, leaving out overhead, is gone into, I would say.

And I think to put on a 10-percent limitation would be to go back to the cost-plus contract.

Thus we clearly get Mr. Woodring's views on how he claims following the aircraft of 1926 would reduce competition. The above quotations from his testimony clearly show why he feels that to advertise in the papers would reduce competitive bidding. In other words, to follow the War Department reasoning—circularizing the aircraft trade, setting out specifications for bids which require a complete airplane to be submitted for test on the line gives free competition and advertising for aircraft procurement, first through design competition, then build the experimental plane through negotiated contract at Government expense based on this design competition would not be as free competition as the system improvised by Mr. Woodring, which keeps the small producer from competing because he cannot build a model plane and submit it on the line for such tests.

Mr. Woodring knows the system he has worked out is clearly contrary to the present law.

Assistant Secretary Woodring appeared before the committee and stated, "If you limit us to 10 percent profit we cannot buy aircraft." How do they know? They have never tried it. Here is the way the Army buys aircraft. They will write a letter or send out a circular stating the requirements they propose for an airplane of a certain design and character. They will send these circulars to a few concerns which they want to have bid on the contracts. A sample plane is then brought down which meets those specifications. Then they conduct flying tests of the airplane, the finished product, and the one that suits them they buy, regardless of price, and regardless of whether it is the highest or lowest bid.

That is shown in the RECORD, and Senator FRAZIER has shown that in debate in the Senate, and the facts cannot successfully be denied. No one will attempt to deny these facts from the War Department records. Take the last contract for 20 planes. Four different concerns bid, and this is what Comptroller McCarl said about this purchase of 20 airplanes by the War Department from the Douglas Aircraft Co., the highest bidder, without any proper competition, as required by law:

The abstract of bids shows that the Douglas Aircraft Co., Inc., which received the award for the delivery of 20 airplanes, submitted a bid of $49,500 each for the skeleton airplanes; the Curtiss-Wright Airplane Co. submitted a bid of $29,500 each; the Fairchild Aircraft Corporation submitted a bid of $29,150 each; and the Bellanca Aircraft Co. submitted a bid of $17,424 each. That is to say, the bid of the Douglas Aircraft Co., Inc., for $49,500 was more than $20,000 each in excess of the bids submitted by the Fairchild Aircraft Corporation and by the Curtiss-Wright Airplane Co. for delivery of airplanes within the specifications as advertised. You report that the bid of the Bellanca Aircraft Co. was not considered because of failure to supply an airplane for tests.

There was no competition with respect to price, and as hereinbefore stated there was a difference of approximately $20,000 per plane, or $400,000 for the 20 planes contracted for (about 94 percent), between the offering by the Douglas Aircraft Co., Inc., which was accepted, and that by the Fairchild Aircraft Corporation, yet the offering of the latter far exceeded the minimum requirements of the specifications.

The plan having provided no method of translating difference in "figures of merit" into terms of money, it would have been possible thereunder for the Douglas Aircraft Co., Inc., or other bidder, whose offering exceeded only to the extent of a few "points" the offerings by competitors, to have obtained an award even though its bid exceeded even in greater amount the bids of competitors than the approximately 94 percent actually appearing here.

There can be no proper evaluation of offerings, except perchance in certain design competitions, where price is totally disregarded and comparison is solely on the basis of design, construction, and performance. Obviously, uses of public moneys appropriated for defense would not be justified in paying an amount possibly three or four times actual value, and much in excess of a bid offering an airplane far exceeding the minimum requirements, just because the offering of the high bid outscored the offering of the lower bidder by a few points—and this perchance, with respect to elements not necessarily of the exact value or importance accorded in the evaluation table.

In the instant matter while it was stated in the request for bids that award would be made under subparagraph (t) of section 10 of the act of July 2, 1926, which subparagraph is applicable to awards for quantity production of particular designs theretofore determined pursuant to law to be best for the needs of the United States, the plan specified for determining the offering to receive the award clearly discloses that no particular design had been so determined to be best for the needs of the United States in that such competition as there was in the matter went only to such elements as design, construction, and performance—competition as to price was wholly lacking.

As has several times been stated by this office in decisions to both the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, with respect to uses of appropriations under the act of July 2, 1926 (44 Stat. 788), the law contemplates that there be design competition for the purpose of determining the airplanes best suited for the needs of the United States, and that after it has been so determined what designs of airplanes are best suited for the needs of the United States there shall be advertising, on the basis of such designs, for quantity production, with award under subparagraph (t) of section 10 of said act. While the War Department has contended for other procedures and has operated in such manner as to make it difficult for the accounting officers of the Government to give reasonable effect to the law as so interpreted by decisions as to the legal availability of the appropriations involved, and yet avoid drawing the lines too sharply on administrative effort, and there have been numerous and extended investigations and hearings by committees of the Congress, yet the law as so interpreted has remained unchanged and the instant transaction was had in the light thereof. In such circumstances the accounting officers may not properly, and without limit, continue to overcome the effects of faulty administration by setting up safeguards around particular transactions, apparently sufficient in the circumstances to protect the Treasury. Then, too, bidders have interests that are for respecting.

The procedure was not as authorized by the act of July 2, 1926, supra, for quantity production and so as to obligate the appropriation proposed to be utilized accordingly, and while it has characteristics of a design competition, as provided for by said act, such a competition does not contemplate purchase of 20 airplanes as was contracted for, but rather 1 or possibly 2—with advertising for quantity production after there has thus been determined the particular airplane best suited to the needs of the United States.

In view of all the circumstances appearing, however, including the appearance of some improvement in administrative methods, it may be stated that if there exists such serious need for early delivery and use as to negative in the public interest cancelation of the contract and advertising for quantity production of such airplane as has been determined to be best suited to the needs of the United States, as contemplated by the act of July 2, 1926, supra, and such facts are made of record here, it would seem this office might be justified in withholding objection to uses of the appropriation in making payments—but only to the extent of established reasonable and necessary costs to contractors in manufacturing the airplanes as contracted for, plus reasonable profit—and within the price as stated in the contract. This, of course, because of total lack of competition as to price and the wide difference between the amount of the high bid, accepted, and the lower bids offering airplanes showing merit far in excess of the minimum requirements, and which were rejected.

So thus we see that the War Department is still pursuing their same old tactics of omitting open competition and are continuing to purchase on a quantity basis for what is supposed to be experimental planes. In this particular case, for example, the Fairchild Aircraft Corporation bid $20,350 per plane less than the Douglas Aircraft Co., and their bid was considerably over the minimum requirements of the War Department, and yet they failed to receive any contract, and this is under the late improvements in procurement carried on about which Mr. Woodring says he is so proud.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. McFARLANE. Here is one of the late contracts the War Department had in buying aircraft. The Douglas Aircraft Co. of California, a part of the Air Trust, bid $49,500 per plane for 20 planes. The other bidders bid from $20,000 to $30,000 less per plane. Each of the bids was above the minimum requirements of the War Department, and yet they bought the Douglas Aircraft plane that cost the Government more than $400,000 for the skeleton planes than the other bids. Think of it. And yet Mr. Woodring has the gall to tell you that this is competition. It is the kind of competition you have today in the War Department.

The same thing goes through the whole field of purchases, including all accessories. I have copies of contracts recently let without competitive bidding for spark plugs, showing we are paying about $3 each for the spark plugs for these planes when you can buy them through competition for less than half that amount.

However, we cannot get competition, and, Mr. Chairman, we are not going to be able to get competition unless this Congress will insist upon the plain letter of the law being enforced.

The experience of the Navy Department clearly shows that this has not worked any hardship upon them and that the system has been satisfactory and only one single concern has ever refused to come in under the system used by the Navy, and it is a much better one than the one used by the War Department. The Navy Department under its 10-percent limitation has been getting more satisfactory results and better equipment than the Army.

As to the statement Mr. Woodring makes that the equipment bought now under this so-called competitive system of his is 2 years ahead of anything in the world, that is all bunk. It is not true. I challenge the statement, and I challenge him to prove it. The planes we are buying today are at least 2 years behind the planes purchased in European countries today, and their performance record shows it.

Practically every record held for different aircraft performances is held by European countries, and they have real competition over there. They have a system of procurement that gets the most for the least money. Over here we are interested so much in merchandizing we have not time to consider the matter seriously and give the American taxpayer a break by giving us the most for our money. The Chase National Bank and the National City Bank and the Morgans are interested in selling their merchandise at the best possible prices regardless of relative world standing; they are not interested in our aircraft maintaining its proper position among the world powers in the air.

Mr. McFARLANE. I wish I had more time to cover this subject. I believe I could give the House some valuable information which they ought to have in passing on this profits-limitation question, as involved in the Army and Navy bills. [Applause.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken on this bill today may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. VINSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 12527, the Navy Department appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

MY TRIBUTE

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the life and character of the late Senator Frank B. Willis, of Ohio.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I have concluded, after many years of service in Congress that there are but two worth-while reasons why any man or woman should be tempted to forsake the happiness of home and its comparative peaceful environments for public service and conflicts.

First. An honest desire to serve the best interests of his fellow man; to lift humanity. If this is genuinely the predominant motive which prompts one to take up the responsibilities of public life—and the belief that the consciousness in his own heart of duty well performed is sufficient reward—then welcome to the political arena, but be assured that the old prophet wisely said, "Vanity, vanity, all is vanity."

Second. The opportunity of public life, particularly service in Congress makes it possible to meet, to know, to enjoy, and to profit by close acquaintance and fellowship with the men and women who carry on the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of our great Government. My service in Congress has afforded me the rare privilege to have personal, and ofttimes intimate, acquaintance with 7 Presidents, scores of Cabinet members, jurists, and possibly 2,000 Senators and Representatives. This high advantage is fully 50 percent of the permanent reward of my humble service.

High among this long and large list of notables who have come and gone and yet tarry looms the name of my colleague, Frank B. Willis. He adorned and ornamented the scrolls upon which are indelibly engrossed the names of many distinguished Ohioans. When near the highest pinnacle of honor and fame, this great and good man was ruthlessly stricken down in his beloved home city of Delaware, where he was so genuinely loved and honored.

It was my privilege and honor to know Senator Willis for 40 years. I knew him as a student at Ada, brilliant and ambitious; as an outstanding professor in that university; as a State legislator. I was here to welcome him when he first came to Congress 25 years ago, happy to congratulate him when he became Governor of Ohio, and again when he returned to serve in the Senate of the United States. His rise was as rapid as it was deserved. No one, no thing, could long restrain his indomitable spirit or his high aspirations. He was more than equal to every trust and to every responsibility; no scar, no stain is upon his escutcheon. He hitched his ambition to the stars, and had not the Common Leveler of all untimely interfered, the highest gift of the American people seemed within his grasp. It is the unsolved mystery of life why one so splendidly equipped for highest honors, one so needed should be so suddenly cut down while at the meridian of life and usefulness.

A prince once said of a king struck down,
Taller is he in death.
These words hold good, now as then,
'Tis after death we measure men.

These lines all must approve. It is after the passions of envy and prejudice are softened by time an unbiased appraisal of the worth and character of men and women are truly and fairly measured. Frank B. Willis stood in life like the mighty oak, towering high, monarch of the forest, which when it crashes to mother earth leaves a void not easily filled or soon replaced. The historian who coldly but considerately measures men for their worth, I am sure, will place my friend Senator Frank B. Willis, high among the great statesmen of his day. His memory will long continue to abide as sweet incense to thousands of admirers and his loved ones.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an aviation industry chart as a part of the remarks I made today in Committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL, 1937

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to reserve all points of order on the bill H. R. 12527, the Navy Department appropriation bill.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the request?

The SPEAKER. Request is made by the gentleman from Michigan that he be permitted to reserve all points of order on the Navy Department appropriation bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I may say to my colleague that it is usual on both sides of the aisle to always allow the minority party to reserve all points of order on an appropriation bill, and I hope the gentleman will not object to this request.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is there any particular item in the bill that the gentleman wishes to reserve points of order to?

Mr. McLEOD. Not at this time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COINAGE OF 50-CENT PIECES, SWEDES IN DELAWARE

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Joint Resolution 231, to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Swedes in Delaware.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 231, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 231

Resolved, etc., That in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Swedes in Delaware there shall be coined at a mint of the United States to be designated by the Director of the Mint not to exceed 20,000 silver 50-cent pieces of standard size, weight, and composition and of a special appropriate single design, containing some recognized emblem of the State of Delaware, to be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, but the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the necessary dies and other preparations for this coinage.

SEC. 2. The coins herein authorized shall bear the date 1936, irrespective of the year in which they are minted or issued, shall be legal tender in any payment to the amount of their face value, and shall be issued only upon the request of the president of the Delaware Tercentenary Commission upon payment by him of the par value of such coins, but not less than 5,000 such coins shall be issued to him at any one time and no such coins shall be issued after the expiration of 1 year after the date of enactment of this act. Such coins may be disposed of at par or at a premium by such commission, and the net proceeds shall be used by it in defraying the expenses incidental and appropriate to the commemoration of such event.

SEC. 3. All laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same, regulating and guarding the process of coinage, providing for the purchase of material, and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of coins, for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting, for the security of the coins, or for any other purposes, whether such laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein authorized.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 1, line 6, strike out the words "to exceed twenty" and insert "less than twenty-five"; page 2, line 10, strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-five."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEWART: Page 2, line 8, after the word "Delaware" insert the word "Swedish."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DURATION OF GENERAL DEBATE

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate tomorrow on the bill under consideration, making appropriations for the Navy Department, be confined to the bill and limited to 1 hour and 30 minutes, not less than 1 hour of which shall be given to the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that general debate upon the pending bill be limited to one hour and a half, to be confined to the bill, with not less than 1 hour of the time mentioned to be allotted to the gentleman from Michigan, the other time to be controlled by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object, but I should like to say that this discussion has been healthy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MAY 1, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we wait again in prayer to hear Thy changeless voice and to see the unvarying face of our Father in Heaven; we lift the cross against a radiant sky. Thou art the author and impulse of every good work, and we would league ourselves with Thee. Be Thou the inspiration of our thoughts; wield Thy scepter and they will lose their weakness; enfold them and they will banish fear; conquer them and they will be courageous. We pray that we may draw from a vision of Thee an intolerance of wrong and a love for righteousness. Impress us, blessed Lord, with the abiding truth: He who serves Thee with a good and upright heart will find in Thee his peace when the day is far spent. In the Master's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WASTE AND TAXES

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by printing a radio address delivered last night by my colleague from Michigan, Mr. WOODRUFF.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of Hon. ROY O. WOODRUFF, of Michigan, over Columbia Broadcasting System April 30, 1936:

Ladies and gentlemen, the demand from the White House that Congress repeal the corporation income tax, the capital-stock tax, and the excess-profits tax which, according to the Treasury officials would have yielded $1,100,000,000 this year, and enact in their place other taxes of acknowledged uncertain productivity, but which are hoped to raise $600,000,000 more than this sum, placing upon the shoulders of the already overburdened taxpayers this additional tax burden, brings more sharply to the attention of the public the profligate way in which the national substance is being dissipated by the administration.

It reminds us again, and vividly, of the many promises of economy and good government with which we were regaled when Franklin D. Roosevelt was campaigning for the high office he now holds.

It reminds us also of the provisions of the platform of the Democratic Party in 1932, to which their Presidential candidate swore unswerving fealty. The American people believe, and have a right to believe, that a party platform embodies a program of legislative and executive action which will be followed scrupulously in the event the party wins the approval of the electorate.

The platform should be, and must be if our institutions are to stand, an inviolable pact with the people. They should hold to the strictest accountability any party or any individual who willfully and flagrantly violates the pact.

By examining the pledges of the Democratic platform and candidate of 1932, and by comparing them with actual performance after the party and candidate had received at the hands of the people an unmistakable mandate to carry out those pledges, we can determine for ourselves whether the covenant has been kept, and whether there has been that scrupulous regard for that platform and those personal pledges which the people of this country have every right to expect.

Another Presidential election approaches, and mere prudence should cause us to examine our most recent administrative history. We should examine the books and cast a balance. Things which have been promised, things which have been done, which are now being done, and which appear to be indicated in the event the present administration should be returned to power, should be examined under the cold light of fact. It is only in this way we can learn whither we are going, what the price of the indicated economic joy ride promises to be, and whether we are willing to pay the price.

The Democratic platform of 1932, among other things, declared:

"We believe that a party platform is a covenant with the people, to be faithfully kept by the party when entrusted with power, and that the people are entitled to know in plain words the terms of the contract to which they are asked to subscribe."

It also declared:

"We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance, to accomplish a saving of not less than 25 percent in the cost of Federal Government."

That Mr. Roosevelt agreed, especially with the latter plank of their plaform was evidenced while making an appeal for the support of the people of Iowa at Sioux City on September 29, 1932, when he said:

"I accuse the present administration of being the greatest spending administration in peacetimes in all history—one which has piled bureau on bureau, commission on commission, and has failed to anticipate the dire needs and the reduced earning power of our people. Bureaus and bureaucrats have been retained at the expense of the taxpayer."

Mr. Roosevelt continued:

"Later in this campaign I propose to analyze the enormous increase in the growth of bureaucracy. We are not getting an adequate return for the money we are spending in Washington; or, to put it another way around, we are spending altogether too much money for Government services which are neither practical or necessary."

Three weeks before election Mr. Roosevelt announced:

"Before any man enters my Cabinet he must give me a twofold pledge of—

"First. Absolute loyalty to the Democratic platform, and especially to its economy plank.

"Second. Complete cooperation with me, looking to economy and reorganization in his department."

He continued:

"I regard reduction in Federal spending as one of the most important issues in this campaign. In my opinion, it is the most direct and effective contribution that government can make to business."

The extravagance Mr. Roosevelt complained about can be determined by an examination of the public records. They will disclose that for the year ending June 30, 1931, under the Republican administration Congress appropriated $3,591,604,616. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, Congress appropriated $3,868,731,286. These must have been the appropriations to which his remarks were directed.

The Government cannot spend until after Congress has appropriated. The figures just mentioned were the limit of expenditures for those years, and it was this spending which so alarmed the Democratic candidate. To carry out his pledge to the people to reduce the spending of the Government 25 percent, it would have been necessary for him to have reduced the yearly expenditures to an average of $2,897,625,959. That was in effect the promise he made to the people of these United States.

Remember, please, that we were in the depths of the depression. The conditions existing at the time he made his campaign were precisely what they were when he was inaugurated. He must have known of the unemployment existing. He surely knew of the suffering among our people. He certainly was not unaware of the appropriations made by the Republican administration from which to feed the hungry and clothe the naked. He at that time must have known the necessity for such appropriations.

It was common knowledge that food and clothing, provided from the Treasury of the United States, were being distributed to the needy by the American Red Cross, working through its local representatives, without expense to the Treasury for such distribution. He must have known this was being done. Mr. Roosevelt must have realized that a sympathetic administration was increasing the governmental expense in order to supply the needs of unfortunate citizens whose needs could not be fully supplied by the local authorities. He knew then, and he knows now, that not the slightest hint of politics crept into the distribution of relief to the poor under that Republican administration. The American Red Cross cannot be charged with playing politics with human misery. He knew spending for relief must continue. All this he knew, and yet he promised to reduce the Government expense 25 percent.

Now, let us examine the performance. Let us see if those promises have been kept. What were the appropriations for the first year of Mr. Roosevelt's administration? Yes; what will they have been for the 4 years when this session adjourns and all appropriation bills will have become the law and the record established for which his administration is responsible? Listen, my friends, while I give you the sad news:

	Appropriations
Congress appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934	$7,102,000,000
Congress appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935	8,581,000,000
Congress appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936	10,350,000,000
Congress will have appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937	8,395,000,000
Four years' total	34,428,000,000

When we speak of billions, we are dealing in sums so huge as to be beyond the comprehension of human minds. It is only by comparison that we can even begin to realize just what they mean.

The United States Government declared war with Germany on the 7th day of April 1917. We were officially at war with that country until July 2, 1921. During that more than 4 years of war, and during which we squandered and wasted like a nation of drunken sailors, and during which we had in the field four and one-half million soldiers, half of whom saw service in Europe, it cost the United States for all civil and war expense the immense sum of $26,000,000,000. This does not include the more than ten billions we loaned our Allies, which the American taxpayers must pay. This, by the way, seems in retrospect to be the familiar Democratic manifestation of the policy of "the good neighbor."

It is interesting to note, particularly in view of the criticism hurled at a previous administration and the promises of economy on the part of the present one, that 4 years of Roosevelt during peacetimes will cost the American taxpayers $8,428,000,000 more than it cost them during the more than 4 years of war under Wilson.

Further, it is also interesting to note the expense of running the Government during the first 124 years of the national existence. From Washington's first inauguration to Wilson's first inauguration, during which time we paid in part the expense of the Revolutionary War; during which time we fought and paid for the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the Indian wars, the Civil War, and the Spanish War and paid all other expenses of government, the cost to the taxpayers all down those 124 years was only $24,340,000,000, or $10,078,000,000 less than Mr. Roosevelt has asked for and received in a little more than 3 years at the hands of this accommodating Democratic Congress.

What has become of his promised economy? How does his spending compare with that of the previous administration, of which he so loudly complained? How does his record in this respect compare with that of his predecessor? The records show that he is spending far more than double the amount. Now the questions arise: How is he spending all this money? What has he done about abolishing useless bureaus and commissions, eliminating extravagance, etc.? Let us examine the facts:

There are today so many new alphabetical set-ups in the city of Washington that I doubt even the President himself knows what they all are, or what they are supposed to do. There are 43 different agencies of the Government spending relief money. Twenty-two of these agencies are of the New Deal, alphabetical, "brain trust" variety, of which the best known, the most extravagant, the most unjustified, the most useless is the Resettlement Administration headed by Prof. Rexford Guy Tugwell.

Verification of this statement can be had from a report of its activities furnished the Ways and Means Committee by Professor Tugwell himself, during the recent hearings on the tax bill, and from an employee of the Resettlement Administration who, of course, belongs to the Democratic Party, otherwise he would not have the job he holds. The latter information came to me not long ago in the form of a letter, which I quote in part as follows:

"We have winked at spending thousands until at last the music must be faced.

"Why not begin in sincerity by trimming some of the useless and worthless agencies? And for the sake of common decency begin with the Resettlement Administration, where—

"First. The Administration pay roll has reached $2,000,000 per month.

"Second. Thirteen thousand chair warmers are doing and duplicating each others' work, and nearly all of it useless work.

"Third. Eight hundred and ninety-four persons in the Administration engaged in 'management', but so far no one has been able to find out what they manage.

"Fourth. More than 3,500 employees of Resettlement are receiving salaries in excess of civil-service ratings, all because they have pull and friends.

"Fifth. The Administration's Construction Division is spending for labor to the tune of $30,000 per day—enough to build at least 10 low-cost houses, but does not build 10 houses a month.

"Sixth. Hundreds of the higher-salaried employees know that they are on dignified relief, but why dish out relief at the rate of $2,500 to $5,000 per year per person?

"Seventh. Of all the headaches the present administration will have will be the one when the public finds out what a disorganized, far-flung, wasteful agency the Resettlement is.

"Eighth. You may be interested in knowing that many have left the Resettlement to save their self-respect, and the writer of this will do so soon."

The Resettlement Administration is the agency referred to as "Utopia unlimited" in a series of articles appearing recently in the Washington Post. It is an agency established without specific authorization of Congress and was brought into existence by Executive order of the President. To this activity—or shall I say "inactivity"—has been allocated by the President the staggering sum of $278,347,171.29. Professor Tugwell has employed, according to his report, 16,943 persons, at an aggregate expense to the taxpayers each year of $24,380,985 for salaries alone.

As nearly as we can gather from the sentimental and gushing pronouncements regarding its origin and purposes, emanating from its publicity division, the philosophy pursued is that by shifting people around from where they are to where Dr. Tugwell thinks they ought to be, somehow in the process the subjects of his experimentation will realize the "more abundant life."

An illustration of this theory working out in practice is seen in the Matanuska Valley project in Alaska, involving transfer of 200 families from Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, where they had established themselves, to the rim of the Arctic Circle, where they were allotted farms of 40 acres per family upon which they, I understand, assumed mortgages of $6,000 each, not one of which can ever be paid, even in part, but where, according to the "brain trusters", agricultural conditions are almost ideal.

To date the Government has spent approximately $18,000 per family. Not a crop has been raised, and already 33 families have thrown up their hands, given it up as a bad job, and have returned home. The remainder of them will undoubtedly follow in the near future.

The Matanuska experiment is only one of many under way. Information coming to us regarding these other projects is replete with instances of similar unsatisfactory conditions which point to ultimate failure, with the result of shocking waste of the public funds, with no permanent benefit to anyone.

An even more startling discrepancy between the cost to the taxpayers and the benefits to the recipients of the favors being spread around greets the inquirer who looks into the fiscal affairs of Professor Tugwell's administration. Administrative costs have been, according to the best information I can secure, $13,000 to provide benefits to the needy of less than $2,500. The reason for this is vividly set forth in the letter from which I quoted earlier in my remarks. This would seem to indicate that the "relief" extended by this agency is confined principally to the "relief" extended to those upon the Resettlement pay roll.

The daily statement of the United States Treasury, dated April 20, 1936, disclosed the fact that of the money allocated to the Resettlement Administration, there was of that date the sum of $173,646,075.56 unexpended. If the President is really desirous of securing the amount of money called for by him, which, of course, the pending tax bill will not provide, I suggest he issue an Executive order putting an end to the fantastic activities of the Resettlement Administration, discharge Professor Tugwell himself and all his 16,943 assistants, and cover back into the Treasury's general fund the $173,646,000 while this sum is still unexpended and available.

There's a well-known axiom that "a dollar saved is a dollar earned." Here is an opportunity to actually secure this magnificent sum of money without delay, and without taxing our people in this amount. I commend this suggestion to the earnest consideration of the President of the United States.

There are many other activities of the administration, entirely without legislative sanction, involving the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars, of no economic need or benefit, and which cannot be justified.

The ridiculous limits to which the administration is going in its squandering and waste of public funds is indicated by the allocation to the States of a sum approximating $60,000,000 to be used for recreation.

Every dollar the Government spends, or ever will spend, must necessarily come from the pockets of the American taxpayer. There is no other source from which it can come. Money, if it is to have value, must be earned by someone in the process of the production of wealth. Taxes must be paid from income. A dollar spent for taxes cannot also be spent for bread or meat. Because of this, whenever taxes are increased the standard of living is lowered accordingly.

Government debts must be paid, principal and interest. They represent taxes.

When we Republicans took over the control of Government from the Democratic Party in 1921 the national debt was 26 billions, in round numbers. When the Democrats were returned to control on March 4, 1933, the national debt had been reduced by the Republican administrations to $20,968,391,487.

The daily statement of the United States Treasury dated April 23, 1936, gives the national debt as of that day as $31,437,665,170.38. All of which indicates that the promises of economy, which carried with them implications of reduced national debt, made when seeking the approval of the electorate, have long since been forgotten, with the result that the national debt has been increased in the amount of $10,499,274,683.38 in a little more than 3 years of this Roosevelt administration, notwithstanding increased taxes during this period. And the end is not yet by any means.

Calvin Coolidge at one time said:

"There is scarcely an economic ill anywhere in our country that cannot be traced directly or indirectly to high taxes. To increase that burden is to disregard the general welfare. Through constructive economy, to decrease taxes is to enlarge the reward of everyone who toils."

President Roosevelt at Pittsburgh on October 19, 1932, in discussing costs of government and the necessity for economy in expenditures, referring to the burdens unnecessarily thrust upon our people through unwise Government spending, made this statement:

"Our workers may never see a tax bill, but they pay in deductions from their wages, in increased costs of what they buy, or (as now) in broad cessation of employment. There is not an unemployed man, there is not a struggling farmer, whose interest in this subject is not direct and vital."

In the face of all this, in the face of the fact that the extravagances and waste now taking place are thrusting upon the shoulders of generations yet unborn tax burdens under which they must stagger throughout their lives; the extravagances and waste go on, and the Democratic leadership has the effrontery to solicit the support of the youth of today, who, with their children and their children's grandchildren, will be called upon to pay a tremendous price for this governmental joyride.

Necessary relief must be carried on, of course, but all this can be done without adding to the public pay rolls hundreds of thousands to administer this relief, by the simple expedient of turning relief administration over to the States and their agencies, which are already established and which are much closer to the people and to the problems presented.

Certainly in the expenditure of the taxpayers' money for public works in order to provide relief some regard should be shown for the necessity of the project. We should at least attempt to secure a dollar's worth for every dollar spent. In every community in this country there are schools which should be built, roads constructed, grade crossings built in order to protect the lives and property of our people, sewers built and extended, that the health of our communities may be further secured. There are other projects which can be undertaken with the knowledge that the coming generations, who will be called upon to pay much the larger part for all this, will receive some benefit from these expenditures. Work projects should be confined to activities of this character.

Nor should there be begun nor finished other projects, such as the Florida ship canal or the automobile highway now being built down the Florida Keys without the contribution of a single penny by the State of Florida, and about which no information can be secured in the city of Washington, but which will cost many millions of dollars of the money of the people of all the States.

The usefulness of the canal, if it is ever completed, will never be such as to even in small part justify its cost, if the opinion of shipping officials can be relied upon.

Passamaquoddy, the economic joke of all the many economic jokes of this administration, which the President, after allocating several million dollars for its development out of the four billion eight hundred and eighty million the Congress so obligingly placed in his hands, has dumped the whole proposition into the lap of Congress and is now demanding that we accept the responsibility and furnish the funds for its completion. Congress has wisely declined to do this.

I think my audience will all remember the avidity with which the administration seized upon the creation of the great "shelterbelt" of forest a hundred miles wide and running north and south for 1,100 miles through the prairie States. Presenting as it did another funnel through which could be poured into the administration's economic ashcan many other hundred millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money, it was received with enthusiastic acclaim by the spenders of the administration. This proposal, accepted without investigation and without the realization that a shelterbelt of trees even a hundred miles wide would furnish little protection to that great expanse of prairie land, was heralded as the solution of the dust storms which have so sorely beset that section of the country in the last few years. Fortunately for the taxpayers, and before much money had been expended, the difficulties of making trees grow in that land, upon which trees had never grown, together with the belated realization of the utter absurdity of the whole thing, became so apparent that it evidently has been abandoned.

Other activities of the administration, both unwise and expensive, should, it seems to me, be given consideration at a time when Congress is considering a proposition of further increasing the tax upon our people. Certainly we who are sent here from the four corners of this great land to protect the economic welfare of the people who send us here, should not in the slightest degree unnecessarily increase the burdens of those whom we represent. If by properly conserving the money already at our disposal, if by eliminating every expense not necessary to our economic life and future, if by eliminating boondoggling and other useless, senseless activities, if by refusing at this time to construct great works at a cost of hundreds of millions in the mere hope that in the dim and distant future they may contribute to the economic welfare; if by doing these things we may meet the financial obligations of the Nation without adding to the tax burdens of our constituents, should we not do so?

One cannot address himself to this subject, it seems to me, and bring every relevant thing into the picture in the time at my disposal. I wish I had time to refer at some length to certain activities now being engaged in by the administration, which vitally affect the everyday life and the economic welfare of the great agricultural class of the country. I shall do so briefly.

It is conceded by every informed person, I think, that upon the welfare of the farmers depends in large degree the welfare of all other classes of our citizens.

That the administration appears to recognize this fact seems to be indicated by some of the things that have been done in the name of agricultural relief. However, certain other things have been and are now being done which more than offset all the benefits the American farmer may have received through the medium of the A. A. A. contracts.

I refer to two things: First. While with one hand we have been taxing our people on the very necessities of life, through the processing taxes, to raise the money with which to pay the farmers for taking millions of acres of good American farm land out of production, we have, with the other hand, been spending hundreds of millions for great irrigation works in the West to bring into production and into competition with farms already in existence, other millions of acres, which up to this time have produced nothing of agricultural value.

These lands are valuable, of course. There is no question but that they will be needed in the distant future when our population shall have increased to the point where the farms now available and now producing can no longer supply the food necessities of our people. But how can we justify taxing our people, taxing our already overburdened farmers, if you please, in order that we may bring into existence these great irrigation projects which can only intensify the almost insurmountable difficulties which already face our farmers?

Second, is the problem presented to the farmers and to the country by the so-called reciprocal trade agreement, under which we are surrendering our markets to the foreign producer. A study of the records for the last year discloses the tremendous increase in imports of farm and other products, while at the same time there was a substantial reduction in our exports. There was a shockingly large increase in our imports of agricultural commodities. Certainly any program which permits the farmer to be assailed upon the one hand by the competition of an always increasing number of irrigation projects, which he is taxed to pay for, and upon the other hand by the competition of constantly increasing importation of foreign agricultural products with their low cost of production can hardly be considered a program wholly in his interests.

The public is supposed to believe that the purpose and effect of this tax bill is to force net earnings out of the treasuries of the corporations into the pockets of the rich, thereby forcing those with large incomes into higher income-tax brackets and compelling them to pay a much larger share of the tax of the country than they have heretofore paid. It will not have this effect for reasons I shall now present.

The income tax, with its exemptions and its graduated scale of taxation is, in my judgment, the fairest tax that has yet been devised. Its purpose, of course, is to compel every taxpayer to pay in proportion to his ability to pay. It has been successfully applied up to a certain point. Unfortunately, the existence of tax-exempt bonds of the Federal Government, the States, and all political subdivisions of the States present an avenue of escape for taxpayers in the higher surtax brackets, thereby preventing the application of the tax upon the very wealthy in full measure.

For instance, a taxable income of $250,000 represents an investment of $4,333,333 in business and productive enterprise at a dividend rate of 6 percent. The income tax on this $250,000 is $128,294. This sum subtracted from the $250,000 leaves a balance or net income of $121,706 on the investment. The same sum invested in tax-exempt securities at 3½ percent would net the taxpayer $143,892, or $22,186 more than he would receive if he should leave his money invested in enterprises which provide jobs for American wage earners. In other words, the present conditions, and the availability of tax-exempt securities as an avenue of investment, present to the taxpayer with this amount of money to invest an inducement of $22,186 per year to invest his money in tax-exempt bonds. The larger the sum available for investment, the larger the inducement to the taxpayer to take his money out of productive enterprise, as is shown by the following table:

Taxable income derived from investment at 6 percent	Tax	Net income after tax	Yield from investment of same capital in 3½ percent bonds	Inducement to invest in tax-exempt bonds
$250,000	$128,294	$121,706	$143,892	$22,186
$500,000	304,144	195,856	291,666	95,810
$1,000,000	679,044	320,966	583,333	262,377
$2,000,000	1,449,019	550,981	1,666,666	1,115,685
$5,000,000	3,788,994	1,211,006	2,916,666	1,705,660
$10,000,000	7,738,994	2,261,006	6,866,006	4,604,994

There is another inducement which the prudent investor rarely overlooks, and that is the fact that there are none of the hazards of business connected with investment in carefully selected tax-exempt securities. The result of this situation is that by far the larger number of the more wealthy citizens do not today have their money invested in corporations or other business, the income from which would be subjected to the higher income-tax brackets. A certain amount is so invested, yes; but when it becomes profitable to enter the avenue of tax escape through this other line of investment, the way is open and the hand of economy, frugality, thrift, careful management of resources, selfishness—whatever you care to call it—beckons and the taxpayer enters.

There is nothing the Congress can do about this so long as it remains possible for the Federal Government, the States, and the subdivisions of the States to issue bonds and other securities, the income from which is immune from taxation. Neither the measure before Congress at this time nor any other law the Congress can enact can in itself change this situation. The 48 States of this Union constitute the only authority which can put an end to this intolerable condition. And they can do so only after the Congress has adopted and sent to them a constitutional amendment correcting this situation.

At different times, before and since the inauguration of President Roosevelt, he has directed attention to this situation and made note of the fact that many of our more wealthy people were, through this medium, escaping their fair share of the national tax burden.

In his tax message of June 19, 1935, he made the following statement:

"I renew, however, at this time the recommendations made by my predecessors for the submission and ratification of a constitutional amendment whereby the Federal Government will be permitted to tax the income on subsequently issued State and local securities, and likewise for the taxation by the State and local governments of future issues of Federal securities."

At the time the President sent his message to Congress the law provided a maximum of 55-percent surtax on individual incomes. That he was fully alive to the ineffectiveness of the higher surtaxes is indicated by his statement quoted above. And yet in that same message he stated:

"The disturbing effect upon our national life that come from great inheritances of wealth and power can in the future be reduced, not only through the method I have just described, but through a definite increase in the taxes now levied upon very great individual net incomes."

He knew, of course, that surtaxes as high as 55 percent were ineffective; that they had already driven hundreds of the larger-income owners into the tax-exempt field; that we were not even then securing the amount of revenue from the rich we had every right to expect; he must have known that to further raise the surtaxes to 75 percent, as was done in the bill he requested, before a constitutional amendment had been submitted to and adopted by the States would result in driving hundreds of others to the protection of the tax-exempt field of investment, with a consequent loss to the Treasury.

But that bill, my friends, was to be known to all and sundry as the great Roosevelt soak-the-rich tax bill; the uninformed were to be convinced that the millennium had arrived and that at last this class were to be compelled to bear their share of this tax burden. To convince them of this it was necessary that the surtaxes be again boosted, so that the orators of the party could go forth in the following election and make their campaigns upon this false premise.

The last two Congresses have not without ample cause become known as rubber-stamp Congresses. Our friends on the other side have, without exception, speedily enacted every measure seriously suggested to them by the President of the United States. There has been no time when rebellion in their ranks, regardless of their personal opinions, has in the slightest degree threatened the enactment of even one of the well-known "must" measures. The President knows this. I am sure he has a high appreciation of the splendid cooperation he has received at the hands of his Democratic Congress. I am sure, also, that he is fully aware that if he were to seriously ask the leaders of the House and the leaders of the Senate to put through the two Houses of Congress a resolution submitting to the States the constitutional amendment mentioned above, it would be done immediately.

Representative TREADWAY, of Massachusetts, 10 long years ago introduced a resolution providing for this constitutional amendment. He has reintroduced it in each succeeding Congress. It is now reposing quietly in the Judiciary Committee of the House, and, notwithstanding frequent urgings, the committee has, up to this time, declined to even hold hearings on the resolution.

Does anyone doubt that should the President ask for the immediate consideration of this resolution that the amiable, distinguished Democratic chairman of that great committee would for one instant refuse such a request? We all know he would not. So what are we waiting for? Why aren't we doing the thing we so clearly should do? Why doesn't the President send up a "must" message on the subject if he is seriously in earnest about this matter? Why isn't this done now, in order that the principle of the graduated income tax may apply to all alike? It hasn't been done up to now and I am satisfied it will not be done during this administration. Why it is not done I shall leave to our Democratic friends to explain.

The tax bill now before Congress is another measure similar to the one of 1935, in that it also is designed to convince the uninformed that through this medium we are going to "soak the rich."

Every Member of Congress should know that the tax on the rich will not be increased as a result of the bill. If there should be an increase of revenue resulting from the enactment of the bill, it necessarily follows that this increased tax will be paid by those other than the rich.

Representative TABER, of New York, disclosed many ways in which revenue can be saved and not cripple any legitimate function of government, nor withhold any necessary money for relief. I have suggested others. Courageous, intelligent action along the lines suggested will make unnecessary any tax bill at this time. Such action would enable us to more nearly approach a balanced Budget than the bill before us, even though the revenue it produces far exceeds the fondest hopes of its proponents.

The seriousness of this situation will be appreciated when it is known that Mr. Morgenthau, Secretary of the Treasury, when appearing today before the Senate Finance Committee on the pending tax bill, let it be known that the current fiscal year's deficits would hit an all-time peace peak of $5,996,000,000 by June 30, and that within 14 months this deficit would mount to $8,641,000,000.

A statement released for publication today by the American Federation of Labor, an organization thoroughly friendly to the present administration, discloses that last month there were 12,184,000 persons still without normal work in industry. There is no better authority as to unemployment conditions than this organization. If anything were needed to show the utter and complete failure of the policy of borrowing and spending and wasting and squandering our way out of the depression and into prosperity, it is this.

I shall vote no more taxes upon an already overburdened people until such time as sanity in expenditures returns to this Government. Wild, wasteful, unnecessary spending seems to be limited only by the amount of money they can raise by taxation and by borrowing, thus increasing the national debt, which is now at a high peak for all time.

These wasters, these boondoggiers, seem to forget that every dollar spent must be earned by someone. They forget that every dollar of tax extracted from the pockets of the toilers and others means one dollar less that can be spent for the necessities of life. They overlook the fact that as taxes increase the standard of living of our people decreases. They have piled upon us debts that cannot be paid in generations, and the end is not yet.

Anticipating, I suppose, their future desire for the money, the administration asked and received at the hands of this complaisant Congress the authority to increase the national debt to $45,000,000,000, and this, my friends, is something for all of us to think about; but more particularly should the youth of the country ponder this and realize what such an eventuality will mean to them and the generations to come after them.

Representative TABER, of New York, ranking Republican member of the Appropriations Committee, in debating the tax bill, pointed out ways in which more than a billion dollars can be saved without crippling any legitimate function of government nor withholding any necessary money for relief. I have suggested others. Courageous, intelligent action along the lines suggested will make unnecessary any tax bill at this time. Why not leave upon the statute books the corporation taxes now yielding an estimated eleven hundred million dollars this year, which this bill surrenders? Why place the corporations of the country in a position where they can, if they are satisfied to conduct their business in an improvident way and lay aside no surplus for the proverbial rainy day, pay no tax whatever? That is what this bill will permit. Why abandon certain definite revenue, and the methods whereby it can be secured, and enter upon another tax experiment of exceedingly doubtful productivity?

A careful study of the bill would seem to indicate that three classes of corporations only would not be embarrassed by the enactment of this bill. They are, first, the larger corporations having at this time adequate surplus to carry them through another period of economic distress. Second, public-service corporations dealing in the necessities of life, and because of this fact having a more continuously stable volume of business than the ordinary corporation. Third, the great chain-store corporations, the business of which is of a character to lend itself readily to expansion, and just as readily to contraction by closing any 1 or 100 of its units whenever they show a loss. For this reason it is not necessary for this class of corporations to carry great surpluses to tide them over an extended period of loss.

As a matter of fact, the penalties upon business resulting from this legislation will fall most heavily upon the smaller corporations, that constitute the industrial and business backbone of the Nation, and those larger organizations which, after the past 5 years of business adversity, find themselves at this time without sufficient surplus to carry them through additional years of adversity. The burdens will rest most heavily upon those least able to bear them and most lightly upon those best able to bear them.

There are very serious objections to the bill, other than those I have mentioned, which I have not the time to elaborate upon, but which are summarized in the report to the House by the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee, as follows:

1. It will discourage and possibly prevent the accumulation of adequate rainy-day reserves and constitutes a direct threat to the security of business, employment, and investments.

2. It will cause corporations to restrict the distribution of their existing tax-paid reserves, which can only be rebuilt under penalty.

3. It will discourage business rehabilitation and expansion and have a retarding effect upon recovery and reemployment.

4. It will hamper the growth of small corporations, impede the development of new enterprises, and foster monopolies.

5. It puts a penalty on prudence and a bounty on improvidence and constitutes an unwholesome interference with the exercise of sound judgment in the management of business.

6. It will accentuate the extremes of future booms and depressions.

7. It will oppress businesses burdened with debts and will result in a restriction on corporate credit.

8. It will drive capital out of productive enterprise into tax-exempt securities.

9. It violates every sound principle of income taxation, is arbitrary and oppressive in its application, and will be unequal and discriminating in its operation.

10. It will crucify financially weak business enterprises, while permitting the strong to minimize or entirely escape the tax.

11. It will create inequities and unfair competitive situations which are far greater and more real than the imaginary ones it purports to correct.

12. It will result in the double taxation of all dividends paid out of reserves, whether accumulated in the past or in the future.

13. It will cause untold confusion and add bewildering complexities, both in the computation and administration of the tax.

14. It abandons an assured revenue of $1,100,000,000 annually for one purely speculative and uncertain, and which promises to be most disappointing in amount, thereby further jeopardizing the Federal revenue.

I might say, in closing, that during the hearings on this bill in no single instance did the representatives of any large corporation appear in opposition thereto.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. Under the special order for today the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STACK] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, I did not withdraw my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman had withdrawn the point of order.

Mr. WITHROW. I said that I would withhold it. I insist on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. STACK. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that until I can get through with these remarks, as I have an important engagement. Will the gentleman please withdraw his point of order?

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, would it be possible for me to yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will withdraw his point of order, I should like to ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw the point of order?

Mr. WITHROW. Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will propound his question, I shall be glad to answer it.

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, I am very much interested in considering the Frazier-Lemke bill on the 11th of May. I am fearful that the House will recess or adjourn, so that not enough legislative days will intervene so as to permit consideration of the measure on the 11th of May. That was my purpose in making the point of order, so that we would be in session tomorrow, if necessary, in order to supply the required number of legislative days, so that we might consider the Frazier-Lemke bill on May 11.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am very glad that the gentleman propounded that question, and I am very glad to answer it not only for his information but for the benefit of all those who may be interested in the Frazier-Lemke bill.

There have been 218 signatures attached to the petition to discharge the Committee on Rules from consideration of that bill. The bill, under the rules of the House, will come up for consideration on the 11th day of May. I want to give the gentleman assurance that, as far as I am concerned, and all of those of us who are in anywise responsible for the program upon this side of the House, there will be no effort whatever, either by attempts to recess or any other parliamentary obstacles, to prevent consideration of that rule on the 11th day of May.

Mr. WITHROW. That is fine. I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to state also to the gentleman from Wisconsin that he has examined the calendar and finds that even if a recess is taken over tomorrow, Saturday, and the following Saturday, unless other recesses are taken, the motion to discharge will be in order on the 11th of May.

Mr. WITHROW. I thank the Chair. That is fine.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STACK] is recognized for 10 minutes.

WHAT IS A CONGRESSMAN?

Mr. STACK. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, my colleagues of the House, I come before you today to give you my humble reaction to what happened last Tuesday, April 28, in my district, the Sixth of Pennsylvania, where as you know a primary election was held. It was an interparty affair and the issue was clearly drawn—the people, or representative government versus slate making by the so-called political bosses behind closed doors. On the one side were the honest-to-God voters of the district—the average citizens, the electors who, if you please, actually own the Government and should rule or direct it, following my philosophy of government or in accordance with Jefferson's philosophy of government. Fortunately for me and representative government these were in the majority. On the other side was the so-called political organization, which by some method, mostly hallucination, imagined that it had absorbed the political mantle of Matt Quay, Boise Penrose, Jim McNichol, and Bill Vare, who not so very long ago used to be able to send into the district a slate concocted in sunny Florida or in the balmy air of Ventnor, N. J., consisting of a candidate who sometimes did not even live in the district, like my illustrious predecessor, and we had to like it and vote for him or not vote at all.

During the campaign I did not mention my opponent's name once. Personalities were not involved here, but principles were involved. I did mention, however, his political backers; and I told my people, with evident effect, that if he were nominated and elected to Congress he would have to take orders, not, however, from them, but from his political bosses. I also told them that if I were their choice I would continue to be their servant, glorified if you will, but just the same their servant, to do their reasonable bidding in the Halls of Congress. That I would continue to vote for and work for legislation favorable to the masses as against the special privileged.

Mr. Speaker, those opposing me brought all kinds of pressure to bear on my friends and workers, even threatening to take their little State and Federal jobs away from them, and in some cases actually doing it. But to no avail. Why? Because my people, the good people of my district, knew my record here in the Halls of Congress; they knew that I had supported the New Deal in all its liberal legislation; they knew that I had their interest at heart and not the money changers; they knew that the American Federation of Labor had endorsed me because my vote has been and always will be for labor; they knew that as a veteran who fought and bled for his country that I was and am interested in the veteran and his dependents; they knew that the substitute post-office employees and all Federal employees benefited by my presence here in Congress; they knew that I was and am against the private control of money under the guise of our so-called Federal Reserve System and that I was and am for the restoration to Congress of its constitutional right to coin money and control the value thereof. Incidentally, in my district there are some 90 units of the National Union for Social Justice. Through his radio voice Father Coughlin had educated them. They knew what they wanted and what they want in and from their Congressman. They are a power not only in my district but throughout the State, as some of my colleagues fortunately or otherwise well know. They are not politicians—just plain businessmen and women interested in the business of their Government; and, after all, Government is a business; it is your business and my business. It is the business or ought to be the business of everyone.

My colleagues of the House, as your friend I am asking you to listen attentively to their proposition. These militant crusaders in behalf of representative government are here to stay; they are here to see that you and I, their servants, shall represent them properly and shall take care of their business in a business manner. Therefore, Mr. Speaker and my friends of the House, my humble reaction to Tuesday's primary in Philadelphia is that you and I must and shall be representatives of the many, not of the few. We must try to represent all our people all the time. We must realize that there are movements sweeping the country uncanny in their strength because of the fact that the public as a whole are sick and tired of gag rule and gang rule and the manipulation of national legislation by a handful of "rubber stamp" leaders who take order from the higher-ups.

We must realize, as I certainly do, that our chief concern here in Congress must be the concern that we should be for Mr. Average Citizen. We must be believers in fair play and that no legislation, that no bill which has any merit should be smothered in committee.

If we do this honestly and fairly our constituents back home will know it and appreciate it and reward us by returning us to office.

They renominated me, and they will reelect me by the largest majority a Democrat ever got out of Philadelphia, the quondam home of Toryism and Republicism.

In conclusion, I want to thank all my friends back home for all the support they gave me in this campaign. I want to thank the National Union for Social Justice. I want to thank the advocates of an old-age pension as proposed in the McGroarty bill. I want to thank Mr. Green and all the friends of organized labor. I want to thank the retail druggists of West Philadelphia for their cooperation and promise them that I will do all I can toward helping to enact into law the Robinson-Patman bill. And, finally, I want to thank the veterans of my district and all the good people who so ably supported my candidacy on April 28, 1936. [Applause.]

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STACK. I yield.

Mr. BOYLAN. I congratulate the gentleman upon his wonderful victory. Incidentally, having in mind the gentleman's address of some weeks ago, I should like to inquire, what became of McCloskey?

Mr. STACK. I would rather let the dead stay buried.

Mr. BOYLAN. There is another boy the gentleman spoke about, Turk Connally. What happened to him?

[Here the gavel fell.]

OLD-AGE PENSIONS AND OUR INDUSTRIAL SYSTEM

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object to the request of the gentleman from Indiana, I hope no one else will make a similar request, because we are exceedingly anxious to proceed with the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. I am in accord with the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, there was a time in our early history when men were more equal to labor to live under our free competitive system of industry than they are today.

There was a time when men could claim the right of more equal opportunity, the right of more equal advantages to labor under our free competitive system of industry than they can claim and hold today.

There was a time when men could labor and take more equal earnings and income, could accumulate more equal property and wealth, and could acquire more equal means with which to live under our free competitive system of industry than they can take and acquire today.

There was a time when the average common man could earn enough and save enough, and did earn and save enough, not only to provide for himself as he labored but to maintain himself and family in old age.

There was a time when parents, meeting with misfortune, a son or child or children, while providing for themselves and families, could help the old folks at home.

And there was a time when the head of the family alone could provide for his wife and children and meet all their requirements to live without his wife, sons, and daughters being compelled to help make the living.

NEW AND CHANGED CONDITIONS

But these times of more equal opportunities and advantages have passed—gone—and been supplanted by the few taking the greater share of the income and amassing swollen fortunes and leaving only the meager portion to be divided up among the many.

Under these new and changed conditions the common laboring man can no longer earn a living while he labors and save up for old age, and a son or child or children, while supporting their own families, can no longer help the old folks at home.

This failure of earnings and income of the masses, the many of the people, has brought a new problem for solution, the problem of providing means of support for the aged and dependent people under which old-age pension legislation has become a vital necessity of the time.

PENSIONS FOR OLD AGE IMPERATIVE

Under these new and changed conditions pension payments for old-age support have become vital and imperative to make up for the want and failure of sufficient earnings and income in the prime working days of men to provide a living while they labor and for old age in their declining days.

Under these new and changed conditions the responsibility for the support of the aged has shifted or is shifting from the people themselves and from the sons and children of parents and has become an obligation upon the State and Nation which the Government must assume as a policy of public justice and human welfare.

OUR INDUSTRIAL SYSTEM

Our free competitive system of industry is a natural system of industry which has grown up and developed among the people and under which they could live in plenty and great abundance accordingly as they are willing to toil and labor in recognition of the equal rights of men.

But under the impulse of selfish human nature actuating the shrewd, crafted, and resourceful, a certain, special few men have taken more than they have earned or could enjoy and have held these earnings from use and comfort of the many, the masses of the people. And the timid, confiding and unsuspecting, yielding to the strenuous strain of human greed of the strong, powerful and designing, have taken less than they have produced and than they need and require and less than sufficient to provide for the common necessaries of life, even while they are laboring from day to day, and nothing when they have reached old age.

ENOUGH FOR ALL

There is enough wealth and property created, enough of the necessaries, comforts, and conveniences, if apportioned as created or produced, to supply all of the people of the world in plenty and great abundance. The wealth produced or created by men is about in equal shares and proportions to each man or individual of the population and if held in such substantial equal portion all would be equally and amply provided for, with the comforts of life today.

But wealth produced in substantially equal shares is held in grossly unequal proportions in vast amounts by a certain, special few, and only the smaller part and remainder by the many to be divided and apportioned out among the masses.

A GAMBLING INDUSTRIAL SYSTEM

A just, honest, and fair industrial system is an industrial system under which every man takes accordingly as he labors, accordingly as he toils to produce and share equally, fairly, and justly with his fellow man and coworkers the fruits of his labor and toil.

But we do not have today an honest and fair industrial system under which the men who create the wealth may take a fair and equal portion of the wealth and property they produce and under which they can take and enjoy the fruits of their toil and labor. Instead of such just industrial system, we have a gambling industrial system, we have a juggerly industrial system, a system under which the certain, crafty few can take and manipulate wealth the many produce, and who can take and are taking and hold more, without performing any service to their fellow man, than the men whose toil and labor produces the wealth.

Under the forms and safeguards of our industrial system provided and left open to insure and guarantee the economic freedom and industrial liberty of the dependent, individual man to labor to live, the certain, special, crafty few have come in to usurp and take advantage of the timid, confiding, and unsuspecting many.

Through certain gambling operations, through the hidden forms of corporations, creating superpower over individual men, through certain bond and stock manipulations, through certain grain and provision-market operations and other shrewd and crafty forms devised, the certain, crafty, special few have taken advantage of these ways left open to appropriate the wealth created by the many, until the people are left with a bare subsistence while toiling and laboring to live and to suffer want and destitution in their old age and declining days.

Under this gambling industrial system, money is manipulated and used to make more money and to make and accumulate money faster than men can labor to make money by the toil, wear, and sacrifice of their bodies. And capital under covered gambling forms is made to yield more earnings and income than all the toil and labor of men and in a few short years to double and triple itself, absorbing all or a greater portion of the income of industry earned in our competitive industrial system.

MEANS OF ADVANTAGES

Wealth under our gambling industrial system, produced by labor, is taken from the people in many crafty and ingenious ways, under grain and produce-market manipulations, under covered bond and stock maneuvers, under control of prices and supplies, by buying, holding, and selling operations, and by creating scarcity or surplus at will.

PRIVATE CONTROL OF MONEY

But the control of money, the most vital part and element of our industrial system, is probably the greatest power under which advantage is taken and by which taxes, interest, and debts are doubled and tripled upon the people secretly covered, hidden, and concealed.

Money is that part of the means and facilities of our economic and industrial system whereby to enable the people to exchange their services and what they produce for other services and what others produce in providing for their wants and needs. Without the means and facilities of money our specialized industrial system could not operate or function for a single day. The people could not provide themselves with the necessaries and comforts of life. They could not take what others produce, nor provide or furnish others with what they produce.

Money, the lifeblood of industry, has been and still is under the private, selfish control of a few bankers and financiers, the shylocks and money changers of today, with power to make high prices or low prices or a panic at will, accordingly as may best serve their interests for the time. By the secret control of money our industrial system cannot only be manipulated, the production and wealth and property, the earnings and income from industry, cannot only be acquired, controlled, and held, but property, earnings, and income can be taken without the knowledge of the people by whose toil and labor it has been produced.

ALL WEALTH CREATED BY LABOR

All wealth which exists today in necessities, comforts, and other forms has been dug out of the ground or produced by the strenuous toil and labor, by the brawn, muscle, and sweat of the brow, and without which no wealth could exist and none of the necessities, comforts, and conveniences could be used and enjoyed by the people.

Under this perverted industrial system, this gambling industrial system, the men who have dug the wealth out of the ground or who have created or produced it by their toil and the sweat of the brow possess and enjoy the least of it. And the men who have neither dug it out nor labored to create or produce the wealth possess the greater part or share of it and use and enjoy the most of it.

GREAT WEALTH HELD BY A FEW

Today some single, individual men hold and possess property and wealth which has required the labor of thousands working their lifetime to create, and the few are taking the earnings and income sufficient to support these thousands while laboring and during old age.

Today under this gambling industrial system some men have taken and are now holding wealth produced by the toil and labor of others which they themselves could not have dug out of the ground, nor created by their toil and labor working night and day every hour since the days of Christ on earth.

Entering under and through the ways left open in our free, competitive system of industry, concealed under the forms of corporations, through market and gambling operations, the few have taken from the masses, the many, until the greater portion of the people have been impoverished during life and left helpless and dependent in old age.

Under this gambling, perverted industrial system, the certain, special few men are taking and holding wealth, earnings, and income which they can never use or see, which they can never realize or enjoy, all for the abnormal pleasure and gratification of holding from the possession and use of others. Under this gambling industrial system in a hidden, covered, and concealed way one-tenth of the people are taking nine-tenths of the income, and nine-tenths of the people are receiving and trying to live and sustain their physical bodies from one-tenth of the income from industry.

THE ABNORMAL FEW

These certain, special few men are the men in whom selfish human nature has been abnormally accentuated, cultivated, and developed, until the impulse to take and possess property, wealth, and hold from others has become a mania, a ruling passion of their lives.

And the way has been left open in our economic and industrial system, concealed under the forms of business or operations and with the secret and private control of money, whereby to take from the many, the masses, the wealth which they have produced, their earnings and income from their toil and labor.

THE AUTOMATIC MACHINE

While wealth, the earnings and income of labor, were being filched and taken from the masses under our gambling industrial system, the automatic machine was invented to lighten the labors of men to live and to help them produce more and better of all the necessaries and comforts of life. But instead, the machine has been seized upon by the shrewd, crafty, and resourceful to further take from the laboring masses their substance, earnings, and income and finally used to dispense with their employment and to further reduce their earnings and income and leave them even more destitute in old age.

If our free competitive system of industry has been left free and equally safeguarded for all the people to labor to live and enjoy the fruits of their toil, the machine, instead of a curse, to reduce their earnings and income and employment, would have come as a blessing to men to aid them to live better and to enjoy more.

THE MACHINE MUST WORK FOR ALL

If the machine could be made to work for all the people, it would not make a scarcity of employment; it would not take the laboring man's place—if the laboring man could take a just share of the earnings and profits of the machine for his own use and advantage, he could work on full time and live better—he could work on full time and have more than before the machine was invented.

The work of the world is not all done. There is more work yet to be performed than all the machines and men can do, than all the machines running full time can do, than all the men working full time can do. Both could not perform all the work that is needed, could not produce more than all the people could enjoy by working full time every day for the next 50 years.

It is a perverted industrial system that, because a few men cannot make profits, the masses must remain idle and in suffering until they are hungry and dependent, until they are exposed to the weather and the elements and driven to public charity and relief.

There is a new day coming in industry. There is a new day coming for the laboring man. There is a new time approaching, when the machine and the laboring man will produce the necessary comforts and conveniences for use and service of all the people without stopping when profits fail for the few.

CONDITION OF PEOPLE BEFORE PANIC

Even before this panic came in 1920 and 1929 the conditions of the laboring masses was growing more and more precarious. The right of men to labor was becoming more and more uncertain, and with their earnings and income vanishing they were already living in fear and apprehension of the future and approaching old age.

When this panic and depression came first in 1920 and again in 1929 the rich had been and were growing richer and the poor poorer for 50 years, and until a few of the people had come to hold and control the greater share of the created wealth and were taking a like portion of earnings and income.

THE CONCENTRATION OF WEALTH

Such was the concentration of wealth in a certain special few. Such was the plight of the many, the masses, from whom wealth had been filched and taken. Such was the meager earnings and income, the failure of the buying and consuming power, of the tax, interest, debt, and mortgage-paying power of the many, the masses, the multitude, when the international bankers and financiers, the modern money changers, in 1920 and 1929, in mad, frenzied, and impatient haste, cornered and withdrew the money supply, brought a fall of values, prices, and wages, prostrating and paralyzing industry, and stopped even the meager earnings coming to the common masses and laboring people.

With the panic coming and continuing throwing the masses out of employment, leaving them in fear, dread, and apprehension of their condition in the future with no security for labor, they are demanding that they be assured against unemployment and failure of income and that provision be made for them in the dependency of old age.

THE PROBLEM LONG REALIZED

While this problem of old-age support has been only suddenly realized by many people, it has long been apprehended and warned against by economic students of the times. It has been coming gradually for over 50 years, with the concentration of wealth in a few and the failure of earnings and income in the many. The problem was seriously facing our social order as a menacing and threatening economic evil even when the panic and depression came, which only brought existing conditions to a full realization and crisis and uncovered and made apparent what was already, in fact, at hand as a pressing emergency to be met.

CONFUSING TAXES IN THE PRICE OF THE VITAL NECESSARIES

There is no tax plan or system more complex, confusing, and less understood in the minds of the people of the country than sales or transaction taxes, and which can more plausibly be urged not only upon the confiding and unsuspecting people but upon many honest leaders of men.

A sales or transaction tax is a tax so mixed, mingled, and confused, so hidden, covered, and concealed in the increased price of the vital necessities of life, that a galling, burdensome tribute can be levied upon and collected from the people without the knowledge of a tax imposed, and while the people are left groaning from its crushing weight. A sales or transaction tax is not only a tax in gross violation of the principle of the ability to pay and every policy of just taxation, but its most vicious part and effect is the exemption of the rich from their just burdens of the Government.

THE OBLIGATION OF GOVERNMENT

Such is the economical and industrial condition of the country, and such is the plight of the aged dependent under our gambling, perverted industrial system—left starving, freezing, suffering, destitute in the midst of the very wealth and riches which they have worn out their bodies to create. And such is the obligation and responsibility of the Governments, State and National, to provide for the comforts of the aged, whom they have allowed exploited and exhausted of their earnings, income, and substance by a toleration or failure to remedy the evils and abuses under which the masses have been filched and left destitute.

A TAX UPON THE RIGHT TO LIVE

A sales or transaction tax is a tax upon the vital necessaries of life required by the common masses to live. It is, in fact, a tax upon the right of the many, the masses, to live and reduces their earnings and income by the amount of the tax imposed. It is for this reason alone that a sales or transaction tax is invariably and always urged upon Congress by those who represent the great fortunes whenever new or additional taxes are proposed, and who seek to protect great wealth and riches from the payment of an equitable share of the tax burden.

TAXING THE POOR

Such a tax to provide for the support of the aged and the dependent people would be a tax upon their children and upon the common classes and the poor, and would be in effect to exempt the rich and the holders of swollen fortunes from the payment of just or substantial part of taxes.

HOW WEALTH IS HELD

The wealth created by the toil and labor of the many, the masses, the multitude, and taken by the certain special few under the evils of our industrial system is held under so-called vested titles, through corporation shares, stocks, and bonds to great physical property, wealth, and assets.

This great, accumulated physical wealth into which the people's earnings and income have gone is not susceptible of division or separation for return back to the people for use in kind and portion required for their support in old age.

Any attempt now to share or apportion this great predatory accumulation of wealth would dismantle industry and trade, would throw our industrial system back to primitive means and methods and make men "jacks of all trades" and leave them masters of none. We must deal with the world as it is, in the form it has been permitted to assume, and not as it ought to have been made and kept to conserve the natural rights of men to labor upon the earth to live and enjoy the fruits of their labor.

INCOME ALONE TO BE REACHED

But these great property interests and wealth are bringing to the certain, special few a great swollen stream of earnings and income which they can never use and enjoy, which they can never see or realize, and which they are hoarding and holding for the abnormal pleasure and gratification of keeping from the use and enjoyment of others. It is only in the form of surplus earnings and income that the wealth taken and appropriated from the toiling, laboring masses can now be reached and taken for a return of a share and portion back to those whose labor produced it for their support in old age.

A TAX UPON THE INCOME OF SURPLUS WEALTH AND SWOLLEN FORTUNES

Before a tax is assessed and levied upon the common masses of the people either in the form of a direct tax, or an indirect sales or transaction tax (which is a tax upon the common masses and the poor) to provide support by a pension for the aged and dependent, a tax should be assessed and levied upon the earnings, dividends, and income from surplus wealth and swollen fortunes sufficient and ample to provide these aged and dependent people with comforts for their remaining years.

SHARING THEIR OWN INCOME

And this should be provided them not as public charity or as a dole but as delayed and deferred payments of a just and equitable share of income from their own created wealth.

THE GOLDEN RULE

Until we can eradicate the economic evils of the times, until we can suppress the industrial gambling operations, until we can overcome monopoly and restraint of trade and make our industrial system free for every man to labor to live and to take and enjoy the fruits of his labor, we must invoke the Golden Rule in favor of the aged and dependent and provide them with a pension for support which will afford the same comforts and necessaries which we would wish provided for ourselves, suffering under like conditions and misfortunes.

And bringing the Golden Rule down to date we should be ready and willing to provide an old-age-pension law and system which will assure the aged people with the same substantial comforts we have enjoyed and would wish to enjoy during our remaining days if left without provision in old age.

THE EVILS MUST BE REMEDIED

But the aged and dependent people left helpless and destitute in this crisis must not only be cared for and supported, but economic conditions must be restored so that their children can earn and save enough, while providing as they labor to live, to support themselves in ample comfort in old age and their declining days.

It would be sad tragedy and commentary upon the future and the young people today to encourage them to spend their all as they labor in wanton indifference and waste with full reliance upon the Government for support when they grow old and infirm.

When the child cannot be trained and brought up in his youth, when character is molding and encouraged to be ambitious, frugal, and saving, with pride, satisfaction, and self-reliance, the progress of the human race will be at an end. It is individual responsibility, it is industrial self-reliance, it is individual initiative which makes for and builds up stability of character and prepares men for the contests which they have waged and must wage in the course of the battles of life.

LABOR MUST TAKE A JUST SHARE OF THE MACHINE EARNINGS

The remedies for the evils of the machine claimed taking the place of the laboring man is not to slow down or stop the automatic machine but to keep the machine working more for the laboring man with whom it is competing and for labor to take the earnings of the machine to maintain buying and consuming power.

While the remedy for those who seek more leisure, with no ambition to live better or enjoy more, may be to reduce their working hours and time, the remedy for those who are ambitious to have more, enjoy more, and live better is for them to work on their full time during their prime working days. The remedy for the working man is to take the earnings and income of the machine under cooperative or collective operations, maintain his normal earnings and income and his full working time and employment during his prime, live better, and enjoy a more abundant life while working and providing support for old age.

If the masses could have only claimed the advantages of the automatic machine in industry, every man who was ready and willing to work, who was willing to toil and labor to live to earn by the sweat of his brow, would have been able to take not only the bare necessities of life but would have been able to use and enjoy a greater share of the necessaries and comforts and many of the luxuries as well.

The automatic machine can only produce. It cannot eat, it cannot wear, it cannot take, use, and consume the necessaries and comforts which it produces. And the certain, special few men taking the greater share of the earnings and income, which under our system of industry is the buying and consuming power, are alike without capacity to consume what the automatic machine produces.

Unless the toiling masses, the multitude, who alone have the capacity to take and consume production, can take a share of the earnings of the automatic machine, the means to consume what the machine produces, the wheels of the machine will slacken, slow down, and finally stand still and rust away on their bearings.

THE AGED DEPENDENTS

I deny and resent the charge made against these elderly, dependent people that they are deliberately taking advantage of the panic and condition of the times to lay down on the taxpayers and claim their support from the Government.

Even under this perverted industrial system, many of these men, now dependent, looking to old age, had been saving for their declining years. They had put their money in the banks or they had paid into building and loan associations, or they had bought investment stocks from which to draw when their working days were over. And many of these elderly, dependent people had been paying on a humble home with only a few hundred dollars remaining to pay when their home would be free and in which they could live in their frugal way. They had worked their way to humble independence and saved up for the coming rainy day.

WHEN THE PANIC CAME

Such was the condition of these aged dependent people when the panic or depression came. They were still working and proud to work, working at their life's chosen trade, or exchanging for a lighter task, but working on the same as before and striving to live on their insufficient pay.

Still up to the panic of 1929, the many with their savings vanishing, and the machine taking away their employment, the masses were toiling on hopeful and cheerful, straining under loss of property and income to provide the necessaries of life burdened and held for excess profits.

Up to the time the panic came the work-worn, aged workingman was still holding some savings earned and laid by during former years, still paying on his mortgage, still hoping to provide for his infirm and declining years.

THE AGED WILLING TO WORK

Even at past 60 many of these elderly people and with a fair saving in hand accustomed to an active life, refused to stop, to step aside and retire, but took just pride and satisfaction in the realization of self-reliance in still working to make their way.

But when the panic came with other men they lost their places. And while waiting for employment to return they were forced to encroach upon their savings, stinting, spending little day by day, until finally their savings were exhausted and their provision for old age was gone.

Or while waiting for employment to return the bank broke with their money on deposit, or the building and loan closed, unable to pay, or their investment stocks fell and fell until they were worthless papers and their home went to delinquent tax sale, or their mortgage was foreclosed.

THE DOOR OF INDUSTRY CLOSED AGAINST THEM

And then seeking employment they found none and were told that when employment did return their advanced age would bar them. The door of industry had swung and closed against them forever, through which they could never enter again. They must wait on the relief rolls for the final summons to come.

WAITED FOR EMPLOYMENT TO RETURN

And even after the panic came the laboring men and common masses waited for employment, waited in patience and forbearance, waited in Christian fortitude for prosperity to come "around the corner", waited while their meager means were being exhausted, waited while their taxes went delinquent, waited while their home was being foreclosed, waited, suffering and in want, while seeing their life savings fade away. And even then they were undismayed, still buoyant, hoping for employment, waiting for a new opportunity, waiting to start life over again, still anxious and impatient to labor to vindicate their pride and their spirit of self-reliance.

And even when this new administration came in 1933 to bring a return of prosperity, the industrial working or laboring men were still buoyant with hope and courage, still looking for employment to return, still waiting to maintain their pride, to vindicate their will to work, their courage to toil on and labor to live.

These aged, work-worn, laboring men were still ready to try again and regain their lost savings and fortunes, to recover their mortgaged homes, until the door of industry was declared locked and closed against them forever and left in a state of helpless destitution. They were not even then asking for a pension. They were only asking to toil and labor. No pension program was demanded. They were still proud and self-reliant, asking no favors but the right to labor to live.

THE AGED HAD SAVED FOR OLD AGE

These old people now dependent were active and industrious in their prime. They had earned and saved up enough to have provided frugally for their comforts, the necessaries for their declining days. And if they could have lived and worked under an honest industrial system, if every man had been allowed to take the wealth, earnings, and income he had produced, they would have spurned and resented a pension as a claim of charity or benevolence.

And if there had been no panic to bring the condition of the people already suffering from a failure of earnings and income under the evils of this gambling system to a crisis, the demand for an old-age pension would have been long delayed and postponed.

Under the delay of two administrations, the suffering and dependency of 6 years, the hope of prosperity long deferred, the realization of a bare existence even with a return of employment, finally destroyed their morale, the pride and independence of men, and many have been driven to relief and to live a precarious existence.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. QUINN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a brief editorial on flood control from the Pittsburgh Press.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, it would please me very much to be able to make an exception in the case of my colleague from Pennsylvania, but the gentleman knows it is the established policy not to print editorials in the RECORD. Much as I regret to do it, I am forced to object.

NAVY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1937

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill

(H. R. 12527) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval forces for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12527, with Mr. VINSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the order of the House on yesterday, there remains 1 hour and 30 minutes of general debate on this bill, to be confined to the bill. Of this hour and a half the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLEOD] has at his disposal 1 hour. Is my understanding correct?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MCLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that I am not taking time from some Members who really could add more than I can to the discussion of the Navy appropriation bill; but in a general way, and because of the happenings of the last 2 or 3 days, and because I took the floor on May 2, 1935, for a similar reason, I really desire just a few minutes at this time to express myself along the same line.

It is not surprising that there exists among our people such real concern over these greatly increased expenses for military and so-called defensive purposes. Much real discussion and anxious consideration has been evidenced, especially during the past year, in the great anxiety of our people in general to formulate proper neutrality legislation. Vast expenditures for military purposes do not appeal too strongly as the method which may convince other nations of our peaceful aims. As representatives of the people, it is our plain duty to vote money sufficient for their protection. Under these extraordinary conditions, especially when funds are so much needed to alleviate distress, we are hard put to prove that we are, in the slightest degree, likely to be attacked by any foreign power. It is inconceivable that anything can happen of such provocative nature that would make a declaration of offensive warfare have any appeal to our people. During these days the jingoist would have but scant followers. It is amazing to survey the change of opinion that has taken place in this country. Those Congressmen and Senators who voted against our entering into the World War seem now to be the greatest of heroes and to glory in what was regarded as almost a treasonable attitude at the time.

Now, every one of you know that before you came to Congress this year you were watched very closely with reference to your attitude toward the subject of neutrality and what you would do to try to make foreign nations believe that we had a peaceful attitude toward them. I want it fully understood that I am not debating against the details of this bill. I have great respect for those who formulated the bill, and I shall vote for the bill, of course. It is, perhaps, the best we can do. I am not too familiar with the details, and I would, therefore, be foolish to try to curb it after such study as I have made with relation to it.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have to go home and the other Members of this House have to go back home and convince our people that what we have done is compatible in the matter of making foreign nations feel that we really have peaceful intentions. The gentleman from New York yesterday indulged in a very catching phrase. It is slogans that cause us so much anxiety. He said that "we are burying the forgotten man under the keels of warships." However, it may be wise to make a reasonable expenditure in our Navy if it can be shown that W. P. A. workers could be transferred to such work.

This probably would not be practicable, as but few persons would be fitted for such employment. The burden of the discussion as to the increase of expenditures for military purposes is certainly to be carried on in the comparison of its need to that of relief purposes and its effect in its expression of our views on neutrality and the interpretation placed by other nations on our really peaceful intentions toward them. Our national recovery is of the paramount importance at the moment. The Nation's leaders in business have gathered in this Capital during the last few days and given full expression of their criticisms of a government which is regarded by a seemingly large majority as being unfriendly and far from helpful to them, even though the country looks to them to bring about this recovery. They are greatly disturbed over the tremendous public debt of mushroom growth. Constantly multiplying taxes and harassment of legislative measures already passed and still threatened cause them utmost concern. We cannot disprove their contention that already they have paid out twenty billions more than necessary to help the unemployment situation. They insist that they have rendered full cooperation, even though it has been done under a constant punitive attitude of an administration unfriendly toward business.

This morning appears the story of the Secretary of the Treasury which he gave in testimony yesterday or the day before before a Senate Finance Committee. Far beyond our early pessimistic statements is the deficit of 1937. We politicians sit here apparently unworried. The larger the appropriation as affecting our individual districts seemingly the more we believe that will help to reelect us. Let businessmen criticize and warn us, but with little effect. We are told that they do not represent the aspirations of the people. They are simply "entrenched greed", in the opinion of this administration. Scant attention is paid to their suggestions here on the floor of Congress. Yet we look to them to pull us out and put the country back on the road to recovery.

Last May I took the floor, urging that the Congress give a little attention to the business leaders who had gathered here from all over the country. I was interested to read what the gentlewoman from Arizona said on yesterday. She complimented so highly the opening courteous address and stated she had read it and reread it. She stated it was a marvelous document, but remarkable for its omissions. I also read that speech, and I read the speech of Mr. Roper, which was also remarkable for its omissions.

Mr. FORD of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. FORD of California. The gentleman has heard of Mr. Carver?

Mr. GIFFORD. I read about him yesterday.

Mr. FORD of California. He is the head of your "brain trust"?

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not know about that.

Mr. FORD of California. Does the gentleman agree with his philosophy?

Mr. GIFFORD. In answer to the gentleman's question I would say with some of it, "yes"; and some of it, "no."

Mr. FORD of California. What does the gentleman agree with? Does the gentleman agree that young people should not marry until they can own an automobile?

Mr. GIFFORD. We understood yesterday when we read the article and also when I read the article in the forum that you would seize upon that as we seized upon the foolish Tugwellian philosophy.

Mr. FORD of California. Does the gentleman agree that is foolish?

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not agree that the Republican Party should gather a "brain trust" to offset the foolishness practiced by your administration.

Mr. FORD of California. Does the gentleman agree with that "brain trust"?

Mr. GIFFORD. No; I do not agree with the idea of a "brain trust." I am opposed to it. I am pleading this morning for sensible businessmen to do the practical work that must be performed by this Congress to bring the Nation back to recovery.

Mr. FORD of California. Then the gentleman disagrees with the Republican "brain trust?"

Mr. GIFFORD. I would do away with all your Tugwellian philosophy. It is not practical. Much of it is silly. I knew when we employed a "brain trust" that you would immediately dig up all the books that were ever written by them and show their former views, their former so-called puppy views, just like we called the Tugwell views puppy views of his earlier writings.

I read Mrs. GREENWAY's statement about the remarkable absence of certain things in the Sibley speech. She said they did not talk about unemployment except for one brief reference. I think she should be very grateful they did not discuss the way money has been spent in Arizona and New Mexico on unemployment problems.

Then there were the remarkable omissions of Mr. Roper when he issued his various commandments as to what business must do, but not a word to the effect that the Government is now going to desist from its persecution of them. Representing our great Government, Mr. Roper, from whom we really did expect helpful things, said not a reassuring word to the businessmen there assembled. The first day of the conference pleasant and peaceful expressions were passed from one to the other in an attempt to dodge anything of a nature that might be critical of the Government. Finally, on yesterday, the real feeling of these men toward us was given expression, and do our ears not burn when we read it? Shall we continue our attempt to fasten this burden of debt and taxation upon business?

Will you not read their statements about the new tax bill and believe they know its effect upon business? If these businessmen do not understand their own business, certainly we do not. When they tell us they spent $20,000,000,000 to relieve unemployment, employing more than they needed to produce in the last 2 or 3 years we cannot deny it. We must believe their statement.

I think I see more clearly than I did a year ago when these prominent men of business came to Washington. I find that there is still a great fear all over the Nation in the country districts. Industry will manufacture shoes for us, they will manufacture textiles for us as we need them, but the trouble is that about every individual in every hamlet in the United States who has a dollar is fearful of using it lest it will not return to him. Frankly, we usually live off of each other by interchange of work or produce. In the past we have traded one with the other, but today there is a great fear lest, if I employ you, you will not employ me back, or if you get hold of any money I have, it will find its way to the bank to be frozen. This former interchange is now sadly among the rank and file of the American people.

Business pleads with us to lessen the burdens of taxpayers. Can we not give some assurance that these vast expenditures are going to be curtailed? Can you not openly say that you are really worried about the great public debt and will take steps to diminish it? Can you not say, "Yes; I am greatly concerned, and I do not wonder that Mr. Morgenthau is concerned"? Rather, however, we appear not to worry about it, but continue even greater spending. The President himself, in his cocksureness, reminds me of the man who said, "If I ever had a chance to acknowledge a mistake, of course, I would do so." It becomes painfully evident that he will never acknowledge a mistake.

I regret that the captains of industry should feel forced to come to Washington and to criticize Congress so severely. But can we refute their declaration, "We understand our business; we do not understand politics, but we must fight these politicians who vote away billions and impose impossible taxes"? I am willing to listen to them. I am sympathetic toward them, because they are the only ones that will bring about recovery in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON].

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to read a short letter and comment thereon, although I believe the debate is to be confined to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I want to read this letter to expose a racket. It is being circulated apparently quite widely throughout the country. It comes from the office of C. D. Hudson, 308 Barr Building, Washington, D. C.:

GENTLEMEN: You are no doubt acquainted with the fact that the Treasury Department has placed on file with the House Ways and Means Committee a list of all persons who in 1934 were reported as receiving salaries of $15,000 per year or more. These names and amounts received have become public information, although with only one copy of file it has been impossible to date for any person or agency to copy off the entire list.

We have made arrangements to secure a copy of this list and are in position to furnish at once names reported from at least 20 States. Additional States will be available within a few days, and it is our hope to have the entire list in 10 days to 2 weeks. It is estimated there are approximately 15,000 names on the entire list.

In most instances the following information is provided: Name, city and State, firm affiliation, and salary collected. The names are classified by States.

We are offering these lists to a selected group of high-type clients for the use of their sales departments. We will be pleased to provide you with this information as rapidly as available for a consideration of $50, for which we would bill you after your receipt of the lists.

In view of the timeliness of this information we would appreciate your prompt consideration of this proposal.

Very truly yours,

C. D. HUDSON.

The House last year had the good sense to defeat the snoopers by repealing the so-called "pink slip" provision. There are bills before the Ways and Means Committee, and especially one introduced by Mr. TREADWAY, to make the salary lists confidential as far as the general public is concerned and simply making lists available for the Members of the House and Senate and the Government departments.

This letter bears out the statement I made on the floor of the House last year that if you make these lists available to the general public they will be more useful to snoopers and racketeers than anyone else, and I am glad that this letter has come to my attention, because it proves the case I tried to make out last year. Although this letter offered the list to a respectable manufacturer, it could easily have been addressed to racketeers and gangsters. I realize that the blame for this unfortunate situation does not lie with the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK].

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to take this opportunity to thank the Committee on Appropriations for the item included in this bill for the preparation of the site, preliminary test pits, cofferdam, and other preliminary work toward the construction of a graving drydock at Mare Island Navy Yard, which was authorized by the naval public works bill of 1935.

Naturally, I regret that the full amount of the authorization is not to be appropriated at the present time. I asked for that at the hearings, but I realize the problems confronting the committee, which has prevented allocation of this full amount. Possibly the amount now allotted, $150,000, is all that can reasonably be expended toward construction during the coming fiscal year. It will at least prepare the way and get the preliminary work of clearing the site completed.

The necessity for additional docks on the Pacific coast, both at Mare Island Navy Yard and Bremerton, and possibly elsewhere, was made very clear during the hearings on the naval public works bill last year. Both navy yards are now operating to capacity, and the lack of additional docking facilities requires a considerable amount of overtime work because of the necessarily shortened docking periods. When the naval public works bill was under consideration I presented a brief table showing the dockings at Mare Island and Puget Sound for the fiscal years 1931 to and inclusive of 1934. I now desire to insert a similar table, bringing it down to the last available date of March 1936:

Dockings at Mare Island and Puget Sound Navy Yards (fiscal years)

Location	1931	1932	1933	1934	1935	July 1935-March 1936
Mare Island drydock no. 1	25	23	37	27	49	27
Puget Sound drydock no. 1	17	40	32	25	37	8
Mare Island drydock no. 2	86	89	90	91	62	54
Puget Sound drydock no. 2	40	12	18	20	17	10

These data show conclusively that existing docks at Mare Island are being used to the utmost capacity, and, used as they are, ships cannot remain over a limited time in dock, nor for the time that the navy yard believes requisite for proper overhaul. In order to properly maintain satisfactory conditions for naval vessels, it is essential that eventually additional drydocks be provided on the Pacific coast. It will, therefore, be a real saving to the Government in its maintenance cost of naval vessels when the additional docks already authorized are completed.

I am fully aware of the many difficulties that the Appropriations Committee has encountered in endeavoring to allocate funds to those projects which are of most importance to the operation of the Navy. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I am very grateful to them for the consideration they have shown in appropriating money for the start of this particular drydock, and I know that as soon as the opportunity is open the additional money for its completion will be made available. [Applause.]

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER].

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, in the morning press we are advised as to the appearance of the Secretary of State, the Honorable Cordell Hull, before the United States Chamber of Commerce yesterday. The burden of his song was that unless we continued our policy of negotiating trade treaties we might have to protect ourselves from the dogs of war which he suggested might be unleashed by all Europe. The trade advantage theme is now to be set aside and an argument highly altruistic in character is offered in its place. If I remember correctly, there was another famous Democrat who was to keep us out of war. Secretary Hull's plan will prove equally disappointing.

Regarding the Canadian treaty, I quote from the Denver Post:

> Our kind of liberalism is the big-hearted, open-handed, giving kind. Canadian liberalism is slightly different. It was learned at the knee of Old Mother England, the best go-getter in the world. Secretary of State Hull, our premier diplomat, is an expert at making this sort of trade agreement. He gave away the profits and the security of the beet-sugar business to Cuba, and now he's going to give the western livestock business to Canada. He apparently is trying to make more treaties than William J. Bryan. The commoner's arbitration treaties were at least harmless; Secretary Hull's are not. Leave him in the State Department long enough and there will be no effective tariff on anything. If you inquire of him about the effect on American workers and their families, he will reply, with his sad and humble look, that such matters are not in his jurisdiction, and will most courteously send an aid to show you the nearest relief station, where you will be given your share of the more abundant life free of charge.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to take a few minutes of this body's time to call your attention to one of the follies of this administration. Much has been said in speeches, over the radio, and through the press about the so-called Reciprocal Tariff Act which was approved on June 12, 1934. It is also important that the country should know something of the effect of this New Deal policy and the attitude of this administration toward the industries of this country and those who seek a judicial review of this law.

The hearings before the Ways and Means Committee when this bill was under consideration and the debates on the floor of the Senate clearly forecast everything that has happened in the administration of this law since its enactment, and, in my opinion, strengthens the prediction as to its unconstitutionality.

When this bill passed the House there was no provision in it for a hearing of any kind, but when it reached the Senate, as a sop to those industries who led an organized opposition to the bill and to those Senators who opposed it, the bill was amended and the present section 4 was inserted. This section reads as follows:

> SEC. 4. Before any foreign trade agreement is concluded with any foreign government or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of this act reasonable public notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement with such government or instrumentality shall be given in order that any interested person may have an opportunity to present his views to the President, or to such agency as the President may designate, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe; and before concluding such agreement the President shall seek information and advice with respect thereto from the United States Tariff Commission, the Departments of State, Agriculture, and Commerce, and from such other sources as he may deem appropriate.

As was predicted at that time on the floor of the Senate, the hearings which have been held prior to the negotiation of the 10 treaties that have been negotiated under this act have been before a committee who has nothing to do with the negotiation of the treaty, but merely acts as a safety valve to permit any representative of industry to register disapproval. In other words, the administration through the newspapers and Government publications announces that it is about to negotiate a treaty with a given foreign country, and without knowing whether or not the commodity which you manufacture is going to be affected or even considered you are given this one opportunity to come down to Washington and offer your objections. After that it is a star-chamber proceeding. The Government economists collaborate behind closed doors with New Deal politicians, and if this group by whim or fancy decide to cut out half the protection which any industry in the United States enjoys under the present tariff act it is done without a word of warning to that industry. The industry first learns in the newspapers of the publication of the treaty which may tomorrow force it into bankruptcy by the invasion of cheap-labor imported merchandise.

As I stated at the outset, we have heard and read much of the efficacy of the New Deal reciprocal-tariff policy. We were told, and we are still being told, that it will increase foreign trade and bring back prosperity. Of course, it has always been difficult for me to understand how you can restore prosperity in this country by opening the doors to competitive merchandise, thereby swelling the army of unemployed, based upon the hope that some foreign country may act as our benefactor by buying American-made high-priced merchandise above the world market. That it has not done so will be seen by some of the facts I am about to state.

Last year importations into the United States increased by $392,000,000 over 1934. Our exports increased by only $149,000,000. The bulk of this increase is not due to the New Deal reciprocal-tariff policy. As a matter of fact, up to the end of 1935, only four agreements had come into effect. These were the agreements with Cuba, Belgium, Haiti, and Sweden. The bulk of our increased imports last year came from countries with which we had no agreement. There was, for example, an increase of $55,000,000 in our imports from Canada, an increase of $36,000,000 in our imports from Argentina, a $40,000,000 increase from Great Britain, $6,000,000 increase from Mexico, $5,000,000 increase from Soviet Russia, and a $34,000,000 increase in our imports from Japan during 1935.

The only thing the New Deal reciprocal-tariff policy has succeeded in doing is to disrupt several lines of trade in which they have in their wisdom seen fit to reduce the duty. It is not even possible for the New Deal advocates to claim any credit for the comparatively slight increase in exports. The principal gains in exports last year were to countries with which we did not have any trade agreement, the United Kingdom and Canada between them accounting for 50 percent of the increase in exports of the United States in 1935.

They told us that this reciprocal-tariff policy was going to be the salvation of the farmer. Last year our exports increased by 7 percent, but the exports of the two groups which make up farm products did not share in this movement. Exports of crude foodstuffs decreased slightly, and exports of manufactured foodstuffs decreased 6 percent. It is time we stopped swallowing the nonsense that has been disseminated as to the advantages of this reciprocal-tariff policy.

On December 7, 1935, at the request of Mr. George S. Fletcher, of Miami, Fla., a fruit and vegetable grower, Lamb & Lerch, a firm of attorneys in New York City, filed a suit in the United States Customs Court at New York attempting to test the constitutionality of this Reciprocal Tariff Act. On January 20, 1936, papers filed by these attorneys in accordance with the regular practice in such matters were forwarded to the United States Customs Court, and in due course set before the third division of that court on March 18, 1936. What took place at that hearing is reported in the New York Times of the following morning, as follows:

TRADE PACT TEST DELAYED BY UNITED STATES—CUSTOMS COURT PUTS CASE OVER AT REQUEST OF ATTORNEYS FOR GOVERNMENT—CUBAN IMPORTS AT STAKE—FLORIDA FRUIT GROWERS CONTEND RECIPROCAL AGREEMENT IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL

Balked in an attempt to obtain an immediate trial of their test case before the United States Customs Court, attorneys for domestic interests abandoned hope yesterday of getting a United States Supreme Court ruling on the constitutionality of the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act before the end of this year.

The third division of the Customs Court, Judge Cline presiding, acting on a motion by Government attorneys fighting the test case by which George S. Fletcher, head of the Florida Agricultural Association, seeks to upset the reciprocal-trade program on constitutional grounds, yesterday adjourned the trial until the June term over protests of John G. Lerch, attorney for Fletcher.

The suit revolves about the duty assessed by the Government on a sample shipment of pineapples from Cuba. In accordance with terms of the trade agreement signed with Cuba in 1934, a tariff rate of 20 cents, instead of the former levy of 40 cents, a case was assessed on the fruit. Fletcher, who imported the shipments, protested the reduced rate and challenged the entire Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act on the ground that Congress exceeded its authority in delegating treaty-making and other powers to the President.

Before a courtroom crowded with spectators representing protectionists, importers, exporters, and others interested in the outcome of the litigation, Mr. Lerch and Charles J. Milville, special attorney on the staff of Joseph R. Jackson, Assistant United States Attorney General in charge of customs cases, engaged in a spirited interchange.

Mr. Lerch charged the Government with following tactics similar to those by which the New Deal successfully delayed tests of the constitutionality of the N. I. R. A., A. A. A., and other measures.

Retorting that the agricultural group involved in the case was attempting to rush the Government into a trial, Mr. Milville held that under long-established custom of the court either party to the suit was entitled to a continuance the first time a case was called for trial.

James Bevans, attorney for the National Council of Importers & Traders, Inc., was given permission to file briefs in the case. His request to participate in the actual trial of the action was denied, however.

Mr. Fletcher, who came here from Miami yesterday expecting to appear as a witness in the trial, told newspaper men outside the courtroom that the jobs of 200,000 Florida residents engaged in fruit packing depend upon the reciprocal-tariff policy being upset.

When Mr. Hull, the present Secretary of State, appeared before the Ways and Means Committee my colleague, Mr. TREADWAY, of Massachusetts, at some length interrogated him as to his views on the constitutionality of this law. Although he was asked the direct question a number of times, a careful examination shows that he neither affirmed nor denied its constitutionality. There have been a number of legal opinions rendered on the constitutionality of this act since it was passed, one of which was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 7, 1936, page 1645, entitled "Legal Aspects of Trade Agreements", but all of which agree that this law is unconstitutional.

It would seem to me that regardless of a campaign year, if the true purpose of the New Deal were to restore prosperity and to build up a legitimate foreign trade, the sooner the United States Supreme Court had an opportunity to pass upon the constitutionality of this act the better it would be for this administration to assure the industries of this country of the legality of a policy which the administration has assumed for the benefit of the farmer and industry. But obviously, through its attitude of delay in the United States Customs Court, which is the only tribunal competent to review this act, the Government is afraid to permit that court to pass upon this case until after election. On March 18, although Mr. Fletcher submitted his case without testimony, the Assistant Attorney General in charge of customs asked for a 3-month adjournment in order that he might look for testimony to round out the case of the other side. It is rather novel, to say the least, to find the defendant in a suit asking for an adjournment to supply deficiencies which he alleges to exist in the plaintiff's case. If these deficiencies actually exist, the defendant should rest his case and receive the judgment of the court. Obviously, the reasons given are not the real reasons, and it is difficult to believe that they would have been asserted or the delay granted had there been no national election in 1936. [Applause.]

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the noise in the Chamber I may have to content myself with talking to the two distinguished ladies on the Republican side this afternoon. I am sure we have a common interest in the appropriations for the national defense.

The introspective quality of mind is a great thing when you come to consider a bill such as a naval appropriation bill. It gives one an opportunity to put himself in a corner and take a sort of moral, mental, and spiritual inventory and disabuse himself of a lot of mental turmoil that always comes along with a bill of this kind. I wish there were about an hour available, because I should like to go into the kind of conflicting emotions that always assail me when I consider a bill of this kind. First, there is the experience of the World War, that has somehow developed a repugnance to the philosophy of submitting international disputes to the arbitrament of the sword. Second, there is the judgment of history that is going to be recorded on us who are shaping the policy of the Nation at the present time. I should like to have history record, so far as I am personally concerned, that at least I sought to make some contribution to the advancement of civilization instead of putting fuel upon the fire of armaments and armament races. Then there comes the queer feeling of expending millions on armament when millions of our people are jobless and hungry. I say the introspective quality of mind is a great thing, because it does give one a chance to come to some settled conclusion and to reconcile what seem to be conflicting emotions.

As we go back home, on patriotic days, we shall no doubt address patriotic assemblages and make stirring appeals for peace. On other occasions we will address the Legionnaires or groups identified with Navy traditions.

I wonder whether the membership of the House has the same difficulty that I have when I address these diverse gatherings. I go home and reflect and study and wonder whether I can reconcile the views I addressed to one body as against the other. Is there a harmony that one can establish in his mind, insofar as peace is concerned, as distinguished from huge appropriations for naval and military armaments? I rather fancy there is; and so I have spent some little time in trying to come to some common ground.

So far as many of the provisions of the bill are concerned, they are, we may say, noncontroversial. Reasonable appropriations for the Hydrographic Bureau and the Bureau of Navigation, for food, fuel, and clothing, for ordnance and technical service, for naval aviation, and all that sort of thing, are not affected by controversy. We can generally agree on those.

I believe we can also find many other points of agreement to which every Member of this House will subscribe. Universal peace is the golden objective which we all seek to attain. We are, or should be, agreed on the principle of armament reduction as a burdensome thing to the taxpayers of all nations. We can all agree upon the desire to abolish war as a method of settling international controversies. We can agree pretty well that we all experience an uncertain feeling about a budget that daily grows to a greated degree of unbalance. We all agree upon the necessity for adequate defense.

Our problem comes, however, when we seek, each for himself, to determine what constitutes adequate defense and what increases should be approved, if any.

Having listened to a number of gentlemen yesterday afternoon who addressed themselves to the bill, it appears to me that the real controversy centers around an increase in the personnel of the Navy, an increase in new capital ships, and replacement of ships that are presently over age.

So we are trying to determine whether we are to vote for an appropiration in excess of half a billion dollars, increasing the personnel, taking care of replacements under the treaty, and taking care of new ships that will bring us up to the treaty strength. As I evaluate the arguments yesterday afternoon, some said there is no need for expanding the Navy, because nobody will invade this country, nobody can invade this country, that we still enjoy a kind of splendid isolation, and we are not committed to any aggressive military or naval policy, and therefore we do not need such an elaborate and far-flung Naval Establishment.

It is contended that armament reduction is necessary to balance the Budget. It is said that a large Naval Establishment is an incentive to war. It is said that the money required to maintain a large Navy can be better used for humanitarian and educational purposes. It is said further that the naval building race will rush the world into universal bankruptcy, that expenditures in the United States for defense purposes are comparatively larger than in other nations, and finally it is argued that we should assume a position of moral leadership in persuading the other nations of the world to join with us toward ultimate disarmament. Those are the principal reasons for opposition to huge naval expenditures. Some of them are rather persuasive. For others, there is an adequate and convincing answer.

As I look on the other side of the picture, however, to find some reason why I as one who has constantly cherished the hope for universal peace, should support the present bill in most of its particulars, I find first of all that on February 6, 1922, when in connection with the Washington Conference, we assumed a kind of moral leadership in the world in the hope of pointing the major nations in the direction toward disarmament and had actually gone so far that we scrapped seven superdreadnaughts and four cruisers uncompleted in which we had invested $176,000,000, we found that Japan, France, Great Britain, and all the rest would not follow our leadership. Perhaps at this particular time, when the world is in a state of hysteria and chaos, we cannot afford to sacrifice our Naval Establishment.

It was a glorious opportunity for this Nation and we embraced it. The tragedy of it is that we found no cooperation and support from other nations. There was a momentary appearance of cooperation, but it soon vanished in thin air. That venture cost us $176,000,000. It was worth it. It would be worth much more than that to have succeeded. At the time of that Washington conference there was tension in the Pacific and elsewhere, and if nothing else was accomplished, we at least relieved the tension for a number of years and made a start on the 5–5–3 limitation between Britain and the United States and Japan.

However, we learned more than that. We learned to our own sorrow that the world had not yet reached the place where we could secure international cooperation toward disarmament except for the customary lip service. We learned also that our faith was a bit premature, and hence there stands before us the lesson of keeping our own naval strength up to the limits established in the treaty.

But on the basis of the present showing and the disturbance and turmoil that you observe in Germany, Italy, France, and other corners of the world, I doubt very much whether it would be the part of wisdom and discretion for us to sacrifice our naval armaments, or even to let them fall into a state of disrepair, or fall behind the parity ratios that were tentatively established in 1922.

Now, as to armament costs as compared with other nations, I look at these comparative figures as to the per-capita expenditure for naval appropriations in this country as compared with others, and then it occurs to me that they can get five men to work in Japan for the same amount of money that they can get one man on this side. Material costs less over there. Labor is infinitely less. So when we seek by comparison to determine whether we are so far ahead in the naval race we must take into consideration how much more they get for a dollar than we. That throws the figures out of all proportion, and they cannot be used as a yardstick or a guide in coming to a conclusion. I fancy that if we made these comparisons by making proper allowance for the difference in living standards, wage levels, and material costs as between the United States and other nations, their per-capita defense and armament costs would far exceed those of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has expired.

Mr. McLEOD. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is distressing to think that there is not an hour to discuss this, but I appreciate there is not, and I am thankful for the time the gentleman has given me. I do believe that we cannot afford to let our Naval Establishment be impaired. When we talk about armaments and think of balancing the Budget and reducing expenditures, we are not getting at the real root of the controversy. As I see it, we are going to make some progress in reducing armament to the irreducible minimum after we have eliminated the causes of war. A large navy is not a cause for war any more than a police force is a cause of crime. A large and adequate defense establishment is not an incentive for war. The causes and incentives, as a study of history discloses, lie in the minds and hearts of those who determine the political and economic policies of nations. The causes are international hatred, suspicion, jealousies, commercial rivalries, and all those things that make nations resort to war as a form of political action, because that is all that war is. When those can be eliminated, then perhaps we can make some real progress in the direction of cutting down these huge armaments everywhere in the world.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is not our Navy really our ocean police force in behalf of peace?

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is our floating frontier, I would say.

I nurture an abiding hope for the day when there will be no war and when the burden of armament can be materially reduced. But that will come only when the reason for armaments has been eliminated and the most intelligent and constructive contribution that we as Members of Congress can make to that end is to assist in developing in this Nation and in all nations a militant consciousness for peace, for understanding, and an appreciation that war is such a futile and costly way of expressing our differences.

We must get upon solid and logical ground and not confuse the issue by assuming that the physical existence of armies and navies are the moving cause for conflict.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire these 5 minutes in order to ask some of the members of the committee some questions. The first is, looking through this bill I do not find where any provision has been made for what I would term oil-tank supply ships of sufficient capacity and speed to properly serve the large battleships when they are in action or when they are cruising, say, from the west coast of the United States to the Philippine Islands as an illustration. I may say I am not a member of the committee, and

I do not know anything about the building or operation of navies, but I speak as a private citizen who feels that if we are to be a world power, if we are to have a world trade, and if we are to be recognized as one of the major countries of the world, we must have a navy. As a private citizen, I do not believe that the Navy is any good unless we have a merchant marine that will back it up and serve it. I do not think it is any good unless we have auxiliary ships which can supply the Navy when engaged in offensive or defensive warfare.

I should like to ask some member of the committee what there is in this bill which provides in any way whatsoever for oil tankers, for instance, that can supply these capital ships, which can move as fast through the water as the capital ships are supposed to move in the event that we are actively engaged in warfare.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Does the gentleman have reference to the two capital ships authorized under this act?

Mr. CRAWFORD. No. I have made a careful study of the four-power pact and the nine-power pact, and I have done some research work in connection with the recent agreement between Great Britain, France, and the United States, and I think I understand quite clearly what you mean by the two capital ships provided for in this bill, but I have not been able to find any equipment which a layman who is interested could lead himself to believe is capable of supplying our capital ships in times of offensive warfare.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. As I understand, what is troubling the gentleman is that there is nothing in the bill dealing with auxiliary ships?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Of the type I am speaking of; yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. What particular type is the gentleman referring to?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am referring to this type: In the committee report it is pointed out that we will need something like seven or eight million barrels of oil. Now, suppose we have trouble on the Asiatic front——

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I understand what the gentleman is referring to. I will state to the gentleman there is a bill on the calendar now, having been reported by the Naval Appropriations Committee, authorizing additional oil tankers and what are known as additional auxiliary craft. It is pending now. The gentleman is absolutely correct. We must have auxiliary ships to support the fighting ships. There are approximately 150 different types of ships which constitute the auxiliary fleet.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I ask the gentleman what provisions, if any, have been made in this bill or any other bill with reference to transport ships?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mrs. KAHN. That has always been the weakness of our Navy. Even at the time when President Roosevelt ordered the first round-the-world trip of our American Navy, the colliers and auxiliary ships were ships which were traveling under foreign flags.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Exactly. We have not had during the past 30 years auxiliary equipment for our Navy that was at all adequate, insofar as I am able to find anywhere in the record. The fact that this House only last year passed a Merchant Marine Act and the Senate is now engulfed in a state of chaos in consideration of a Merchant Marine Act is conclusive evidence the auxiliary equipment is not now available. Capital ships are obsolete after 20 to 26 years of service. If new ones are to be built, certainly we must provide new and modern and swift auxiliary equipment to go along with them. Furthermore, a Navy is helpless without an adequate merchant marine, and any informed person knows we are so far behind in this respect that it is a national tragedy.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman is clearly misinformed. We have ample ships of auxiliary types to support every type of battleship, submarine, cruiser, and destroyer that the Navy requires.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how the time stands?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has 29 minutes remaining, the gentleman from Michigan 24 minutes.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to express the profound regret of the minority members of the Navy subcommittee that the chairman is unable to attend the debate on the pending Navy supply bill.

Representative CARY has won our friendship and warm admiration by the impartial spirit of cooperation that has characterized his work as chairman of the Navy subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations. In acknowledging his conscientious and whole-hearted efforts in drafting the pending bill, I am happy to pay tribute to those high qualities and the ability which make working with him on the Appropriations Committee a pleasure. I know that all my colleagues in the House join with me in extending the heartiest good wishes for his speedy and complete recovery.

At this time I should also like to speak a word in commendation of Mr. John Pugh, the able and efficient clerk of the Navy subcommittee. Mr. Pugh's long experience and deep knowledge concerning naval affairs have made him an invaluable asset to our subcommittee and his painstaking and untiring efforts have been of great assistance in the preparation of this bill.

In preparing the estimates for the naval supply bill for the fiscal year 1937, a number of reductions were made in the name of economy. There are still a number of items that could be drastically reduced without sacrificing measures essential for adequate national defense. At the same time there are one or two instances where reductions have been made to an extent that justifies the charge of false economy.

Starting with the Second Deficiency Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1935, funds in the amount of $10,000,000 were appropriated to build a huge floating drydock. The contract for construction of this dock has not yet been let and the Navy Department is still working on the plans for its construction.

Facts developed during the hearings (pp. 7–10) show that it is really contemplated only to use this floating drydock at Honolulu. No good reason has been given for its construction that would outweigh the additional heavy initial cost and higher expenses of maintenance and operation.

It was testified by Navy witnesses that the cost of constructing a fixed graving dock of the same capacity at Pearl Harbor would be about $4,000,000, including pumping plant and other accessories. In addition it was shown that the material upkeep would undoubtedly be greater for a floating drydock because its steel construction would be more perishable than concrete when exposed to salt water and weather.

As the Navy Department expects to keep this floating dock permanently located at Honolulu there is no good reason why such a vessel should be constructed thousands of miles from its point of use, and then, at great expense, towed to its probable permanent anchoring place.

This is a frill which has not been justified and which should be eliminated for the sake of sensible economy. When the bill is read for amendment, following the debate, it is my intention to offer an amendment to provide that a fixed graving dock be used in place of this huge floating experiment and reappropriate the ten millions.

This is an instance where funds could be further reduced without the least danger to proper provisions for adequate defense. I should now like to call the attention of the House to an instance of false economy that has crept into the naval policies of the administration.

On page 416 of the hearings we find that the subcommittee was informed last year by an expert naval witness that slashing needed funds to provide machine tools was "false economy."

This year the estimates for machine tools for use in the naval building program were again reduced. For efficient tools, naval experts had estimated that $1,400,000 was necessary in addition to the amount finally requested. On page 412 of the hearings appears the question:

> Originally, Admiral, you felt that for the efficiency of your Bureau the amount for machine tools, $2,150,000, was necessary for the efficiency of that work for the coming year, and that that much money was needed to be included in the annual supply bill?
> Admiral LAND. That is correct.

This same witness had previously testified—page 410—in answering a question relative to possible obstruction of the Navy program resulting from slashing funds for needed machine tools that—

> It will be a little more expensive and a little less efficient with a little more delay.

On page 481 of the hearings, and the next few succeeding pages, we find a glaring example of funds being spent without justification. The Government is now operating a factory and producing airplanes and airplane engines at costs far in excess of those incurred by private manufacturers. The testimony in these pages shows that this project, started with an idea of providing a yardstick to measure costs of planes, will be an expensive white elephant. An expert naval witness estimated that it would cost the Navy $27,000 to build a plane that could be manufactured by a private aircraft concern for $25,000. In reply to a question, Admiral King told the subcommittee that he could not see any saving in this venture "in the immediate future."

There is another item of considerable importance that the House should bear in mind in passing on naval supply bills. These appropriation measures have not been reflecting the actual expenditures for naval construction. On page 342 of the hearings it was developed that nearly half of the 106 new ships under construction are being built with "emergency" funds.

When the Navy is finally completed to treaty strength the maintenance cost of approximately $555,000,000 yearly is apt to come as a rather surprising shock to the country. If the Navy is to be built up to treaty strength it should be done openly, rather than by prolonging the process and permitting deficiencies in the matter of needed materials, needed tools, and needed ships. Instead of drawing on emergency funds to help build up the Navy, funds that the country knows nothing about, specific funds should be appropriated in the annual supply bills. [Applause.]

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER].

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I join with the other Members, both of the majority and the minority, in expressing my regret that the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARY] because of illness cannot be here today to carry out the program of this naval appropriation bill.

I feel a word of commendation should be expressed to our colleague the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. UMSTEAD] for his willingness to assume the task of carrying this naval appropriation bill through the House.

Speaking for the minority, in most instances we assure you our whole-hearted support so that this bill may be carried out as the committee has reported it. In most instances we are in agreement. There are some criticisms I feel we of the minority should direct to the attention of the Committee. The minority since 1933 has taken exception to the general policy of the present administration with respect to the right of the Congress to delegate to the Executive the spending of money. Those who have pacific tendencies, those who feel that the Navy is too large, should be mindful of the fact that in a very large measure this present bill is carrying out a policy of the Democratic administration. I want all the pacifists on the Democratic side of the House to take the blame upon themselves with respect to a large part of the costs of this present Navy bill. You delegated to the President the expenditure of funds. Yours is the responsibility for the course you pursued in connection with those expenditures. The Democrats are responsible entirely if you authorize the Executive to obligate the country and then require this present Appropriations Committee to complete projects for which sufficient emergency funds were not provided. I want every pacifist on the Democratic side of the House to go back into his own district and tell the folks back home that he is responsible for this big Navy bill.

I want the pacifists on the Democratic side to say to their people who complain about the expenditure of all these funds: "We gave the President the right to make these large contracts, to start these stupendous projects, to create these liabilities. He entered into the contracts and they are costing more than they should, but we have to pay the bill."

Just go through the bill and see a few of the items. Just go through the bill item by item and note the extent to which the emergency program provided for through the delegation of power to the Executive by the Democratic side of the House affects the bill, and see whether or not a large part of this Navy bill could not have been eliminated had there been the careful scrutiny, the painstaking investigation, the examination of witnesses which should always precede the matter of the making of appropriations by this body. But you Democrats did not do it. You gave carte blanche authority not for a thousand, not for a million, but for billions.

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I am sorry I cannot yield. I should like to be courteous, but I have only 17 minutes.

You gave carte blanche authority to the Executive to spend the money and now you are beginning to complain because you have to help finish the projects.

Last year—I am talking to the pacifists——

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I am awfully sorry. I will yield if the gentlewoman can secure me additional time.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 minute that he may yield to the gentlewoman from New York.

Mr. DITTER. I thank the gentleman from North Carolina, and yield to the gentlewoman from New York.

Mrs. O'DAY. As a so-called pacifist I want to explain that what——

Mr. DITTER. I yielded for a question.

Mrs. O'DAY. Does the gentleman understand that those who are opposed to war are willing to yield to the President power over any amount of appropriations for constructive purposes, but not for destructive purposes?

Mr. DITTER. May I ask the gentlewoman if she feels that the two new battleships included in the present appropriation bill are for constructive or destructive purposes?

Mrs. O'DAY. Destructive purposes.

Mr. DITTER. So the lady takes exception to the administration policy with respect to these two new battleships?

Mrs. O'DAY. The lady does.

Mr. DITTER. May I enlighten the lady by saying these two new battleships came into the appropriation bill presently before the House, not as a result of any hearings on this bill. We did not get one word of testimony in the hearings with respect to these two battleships. They came in entirely at the request of the present administration and through the Naval Establishment; so we give entire credit to the administration for these two destructive factors to which the lady takes such violent exception.

Mrs. O'DAY. Why not give credit for the constructive appropriations also?

Mr. DITTER. Of course, may I say to the gentlewoman and the other Members of the Committee, in my opinion, this Navy, second to none, is a constructive factor. I just wanted to get the lady's opinion with respect to destructive and constructive.

I am profoundly impressed with the fact that this present Navy bill and the present naval program, with the exception of some few items, is a constructive factor which is going to make for the peace of the world and will not in any way endanger or hazard the peace of the world. May I say to the gentlewoman from New York that that is her President's program, so she should join heartily in supporting this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, may I make just a few further observations? I wonder how many Members of the House are aware of the fact that down in Charlestown, W. Va., there is located a plant called an ordnance plant. I wonder how many know that in this present bill a very considerable sum is included for the maintenance of that dead baby down there in Charlestown, W. Va. It represents an investment of $25,000,000 and was intended first as a yardstick. I thought that we never had yardsticks until the present administration came into power, but I find that a yardstick for ordnance manufacture was started by a Democratic administration back in the war days. They wanted to measure how much it should cost to manufacture armament and projectiles in the State of Pennsylvania. They tried to create the impression that we Pennsylvanians were making too much money out of our steel mills, so they built a yardstick down there in Charlestown, W. Va.

Do you know what the record shows? It shows that the projectiles that were turned out down there in Charlestown, W. Va., cost twice as much as the contract price of the projectiles which came out of the steel mills of Pennsylvania. It showed that the armor plate they tried to make, but never produced, cost much in excess of what that same armor plate could have been bought for in the steel mills of Pennsylvania. Down there is an investment of $25,000,000, plus a million or more of maintenance cost, with absolutely nothing to show for the money. It is just one of those yardsticks by which the profits of private industry were supposedly to be measured and which proved a fiasco and a fizzle.

Mr. Chairman, my own conclusion is that probably some of these other yardsticks that the present administration is trying to create to measure the profits of private industry will suffer the same fate and ultimately be in a similar condition to the armament plant down there in West Virginia. Let us sell the plant, let us give it away, if necessary, but in any event let us save the taxpayers the cost of maintaining and policing that plant down there, in which there is not a wheel turning, in which there is not a bit of production going on, which stands there as a magnificent monument to the wrong philosophy that private industry should be measured in the matter of profits by some governmental agency.

Mr. Chairman, there is another thing about this Navy bill I want to mention. Ten million dollars was appropriated in the deficiency bill last year for another experiment. It cannot be called a yardstick. The Naval Establishment did not come before the Navy Appropriations Committee, but after the Navy Appropriations Committee had concluded its hearings and after the bill had been passed by the House, surreptitiously the naval group came before the deficiency committee and asked for an appropriation of $10,000,000 for a floating drydock. Not another country in the world has a floating drydock of this kind. I understand the original plans provided for fireplaces in the officers' quarters of this floating drydock. It was originally to cost $10,000,000. Now they come before us and tell us that the $10,000,000 will not pay the bill. There is, therefore, provided an additional $5,000,000, and the probabilities are that the $5,000,000 additional will not pay the total cost of this floating drydock.

Mr. Chairman, what is the purpose of the floating drydock? Well, as I understand it, they want to place it out in the Pacific Ocean. It is going to float around out there. Let us reappropriate this money. Those of you who want to save money, those Democrats who want to go back to your primaries and show that you are for economy, those Democrats who want to go back home and say that you want to carry out that old campaign promise and the old 1932 platform of saving money; in other words, if you want to resurrect that old hope again, join with us Republicans in our program today when we seek to reappropriate this $10,000,000. You will have a mighty fine argument to make to your people in that event. You may then say, "I was for economy. I tried to save $10,000,000 of your money." See whether you cannot arrange to have the $10,000,000 stricken out and have a feather in your cap, and get some credit for these many, many deficiencies that are presently charged against you as a result of the policy of this administration of lack of consideration, and as a result of this spendthrift policy which has characterized every single action of the present administration.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. If the gentleman will secure additional time, I will yield.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 minute.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman give the Committee the benefit of what he proposes to do with the $10,000,000 that he proposes to take away from this floating drydock? Does he propose to put it back in the Treasury, or does he propose to build a drydock on land?

Mr. DITTER. I recognize that we cannot do anything unless the sensible, splendid Democratic majority, such as is represented by my distinguished friend from Georgia, joins with us. Unless they do that, we cannot do anything.

If you will give us your support, we purpose asking that this money be reappropriated for the purpose of a model basin at $3,500,000, for which, I understand, the gentleman engineered the legislative program through the House, and for which, no doubt, he holds an opinion with respect to the necessity therefor.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. What are you going to do with the $7,000,000 left?

Mr. DITTER. I want to tell the House that if they do not do this, or if the House decides it cannot go along with this $10,000,000 of reappropriation which we are going to request, then my friend here is coming in very, very shortly, probably paving the way through the deficiency committee again, for $3,500,000 additional for a model basin.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am going to offer an amendment on this bill.

Mr. DITTER. Then I assume the gentleman will join with me in supporting this program whereby this $10,000,000 is to be saved.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Not at all, because I do not propose to let the gentleman, under the guise of economy, jeopardize national defense on the Pacific coast.

Mr. DITTER. I wish I might concur with the gentleman in that. Will he not certainly acknowledge—and I believe he will—that this is purely an experimental proposition; that there is nothing of its kind afloat on the seas under the flag of any nation?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman supported the bill when the Congress authorized it last year; and if he will examine the hearings, he will find that Great Britain has a floating drydock and tried to unload it on the United States.

Mr. DITTER. Not of the size or of the kind we propose having.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The purpose is identically the same.

Mr. DITTER. The purpose is the same but on a very much smaller scale and probably on a practical scale; and may I say I supported it at that time because, like a great many other Republicans, we were deluded into believing that the assurance of the gentleman and those identified with the administration could be depended upon, and that the program would cost $10,000,000 instead of probably double that amount. We have been confident, because we have had such certainly we are going to correct the error of our ways. We are going to try to show that this disappointment brings us a remarkable degree of confidence in some of the assertions of the gentleman and others identified with this administration. If we have been mistaken, if we have been disappointed, over to a program whereby we will insist on economy——

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. No; the gentleman can use his own time.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I have not any time, and the gentleman controls the time over on his side.

Mr. DITTER. I have just a little time and I am going to use it myself.

Now, just a further word. I want the membership of the House to know something else about this naval appropriation bill. I wonder how many of the Members of the House here know about the operations of the selection board. I wonder how many of you know that officers in the Navy are ruled arbitrarily by a group——

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I shall be pleased to yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania 2 additional minutes.

Mr. DITTER. I thank the chairman of the subcommittee, because I would like to bring these figures to the attention of the House.

As a result of the forced retirements under the action of the selection board in 1921, the cost of these enforced retirements was $16,034.63. Mark these figures, if you will. By 1936 that cost had increased to $971,650.23. What does this represent? Year by year you are putting a colossal burden on the shoulders of the taxpayer as a result of the action of the selection board causing involuntary retirements from the service, and these enforced retirements from the service requiring not only payment under retirement to those who are involuntarily separated from the service, but the substitution of additional men who must take their places, thereby increasing the load and putting an additional load upon the naval appropriation bill to carry out the selection board policy.

I feel that the Naval Affairs Committee has a distinct responsibility. I think it should bring in here some legislation to do away with the selection board program. I believe it should come in here and honestly face the facts and tell the people of the country that an expenditure of more than $971,000 this year—and the amount is increasing every year—has been brought about as a result of the action of this selection board.

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I know there are few Members of the House who realize the tremendous load being carried as a result of the selection board, and it is my conviction that the rank and file of the men in the service, with the exception of the few in the top grade, would welcome the opportunity of having this selection board eliminated and permitting instead the same kind of promotion program that is carried on in the Army.

The importance of the bill now before the House cannot be overemphasized. It has more than a domestic significance. It plays an important part in our foreign policy. It involves the question of national defense. It is definitely related to the momentous and critical subject of world peace. A tremendous responsibility devolves upon each of us in the consideration of this measure as we study the justification for the needs of the Naval Establishment and weigh the evidence presented by those charged with the administration of naval affairs. The far-reaching effects of our naval policy—of which this appropriation bill is a part—should be recognized by every Member of the House. It is necessary that we consider pertinent facts if we are to arrive at an honest and impartial decision.

Neither sectionalism nor partisanship should influence our conclusions. We should dismiss all thought of North or South, of East or West. We should forego our sense of loyalty to industry or to agriculture. We should avoid a spirit of allegiance to one political party or to another, and without rancor or bitterness or prejudice direct our attention to the problem as a common problem, the successful solution of which will bring a lasting satisfaction to us and a benediction to those who will follow after us.

There are differences of opinion on the question of the safest course to pursue in order to continue at peace with the nations of the world. There can be no doubt of our desire for peace. The record of our actions is eloquent testimony of our ambitions. Many men and women are apprehensive that the present naval policy will prove conducive to conflict rather than a deterrent of war. I cannot concur with this conclusion. I attribute the highest motives to those who honestly champion the cause of peace and who, actuated by lofty purposes and a noble idealism, seek to stop a competitive armaments race, but I am not persuaded that the course which they advocate will lead to the attainment of the desired goal.

We have in our midst those who would make disarmament a vehicle for the advancement of their own selfish interests and for the development of class prejudice and discontent. Protestations of a willingness to appropriate billions of dollars for a favored class or for a favored project in order to gain political popularity and at the same time a vehement denouncement of reasonable efforts to provide an adequate national defense, raise a grave doubt of the bona fides of the protestants. It smacks much of demagoguery. I loathe the demagogue who proclaims tenets of pacifism for the Nation in order that he may arouse social animosities and the discontent of class hatreds among our people. I insist that it should not be possible for financial interests to marshal the manhood of America to aid in maneuvers of aggrandizement, but raising a hue and cry about munition makers, potent as such hue and cry may be to excite popular wrath, will never allay suspicions, destroy doubts, or heal the festering sores of old animosities. Taking the profits out of war will not take the venom out of hate. Demagoguery depends upon deceit for its appeal. It thrives on deception. Intrigue is essential to its effectiveness. Its heart is a throbbing dynamo of malice, hatred, and vindictiveness. It is the very antithesis of peace and good will. Demagoguery never creates. It always destroys. The demagogue takes on the mantle of peace to hide his subtle machinations. He is the willing ally of and fluent conspirator with subversive leaders of dangerous movements of sedition and revolution. The demagogue in his role of an inciter has no claim either to our patience or confidence. To this group I tender neither an explanation of nor a reason for the present needs of the naval establishment. They have neither the right to expect nor the right to demand them. They would neither accept nor approve them. As enemies within our gates they deserve only our disdain and avoidance.

Honest men—and I might say altruistic men—may have differences of opinion as to the methods which should be pursued to reach a certain objective. As for myself, I yield to no man in a desire for world peace, and particularly in a desire that the United States may be saved from any possible involvement in the disturbing conditions prevailing in Europe today. My hopes are just as intense, my aspirations are just as genuine, my prayers are just as fervent as the hopes and aspirations and prayers of the most-devoted disciple dedicated to the cause of peace among the nations of the world. But, sad as it is to relate, most of us acknowledge that hopes and aspirations are frustrated and that prayers are unavailing when nations commit themselves to a program of aggression and plunder. Unfortunately, war is a horrible reality. I am afraid that it will continue to be a reality until the discordant notes of human frailties are brought into harmony with the music of eternal verities. Men and nations continue to be selfish, avaricious, pugnacious, and quarrelsome. Until the hearts of men are changed these traits of men will remain, and as long as they remain, the peace of the world will be threatened. I claim common ground with all conscientious, practical endeavorers whose hearts are thrilled with the hope for the establishment of good will, friendship, and understanding.

But in view of the attitude of other nations and in the light of our experiences, what should our position be? Can we be unmindful of the serious aspects of world conditions? Should we substitute the unrealized dreams of disappointed idealists for the actual experiences of everyday life? Can our sense of national self-respect countenance a complete disregard of the contingencies which have been created? Should we invite difficulties by courting a spirit of complacency and by refusing to acknowledge the existence of proven facts?

Out of the cataclysm of the World War there came new convictions and new hopes for world peace. Not only the horrors of war but the price of war had made an impression upon us. We discussed the causes, the sacrifices, the sorrows, and the incalculable costs of the conflict, and to most men there came an abiding conviction of the utter futility of such struggles. The enormity and wantonness of destruction impelled men everywhere to seek for an avenue of escape from a possible repetition of the catastrophe. We had indulged in an orgy of destruction, we were anxious for opportunities of construction. From all sides came the cry for the lifting of the crushing burden of debt under which all nations staggered. Convincingly there came to us the realization of the absurdity of permitting passions and prejudice to rule when reason and judgment might be supreme. A new hope was born in the hearts of men that frankness and cooperation and understanding would be the new order among the nations of the world.

With this conviction and hope we addressed ourselves to a solution of the problem in a practical way. The Washington Conference on the Limitation of Armaments was the conscientious endeavor on the part of the United States to destroy the lurking suspicions out of which misunderstandings so often arise, to translate into a glorious reality the idealism toward which the finer sensibilities of men point the way, and to invite and offer the fullest degree of cooperation to the other nations for the adoption of proposals, free of intrigue and deception, which would result in a reduction of the means for war and in an increase of enjoyment of the arts of peace. We urged upon the conferees that the time had passed for inquiry and investigation and that the time had arrived for positive action. We insisted that the heart of the problem was competition in naval construction and that if the problem was to be solved competition must be abandoned. We recognized that the purposes of the conference could not be attained without sacrifices and advocated a cessation of building programs, even though it entailed heavy losses for ships under construction. As an evidence of our honesty of purpose and of the genuineness of our desires we put into execution our spirit at the conference by scrapping our finest men of war at a loss of almost $200,000,000. I submit that actions speak louder than words and that history does not record a finer example of the willingness to sacrifice for a practical solution of a world problem than the voluntary destruction of battleships by the United States following the Washington Conference in 1922. At Geneva, in 1927, and again at London in 1930, our efforts were directed toward an extension of the disarmament program and toward a larger appreciation of the value of peace. Reference need hardly be made to the outcome of the conference recently held in London and from which conference our representatives have just returned. Suffice it to say that the picture is dismal and disappointing. The future is foreboding. But we can claim leadership in an endeavor and a continuity of endeavor which would have tranquilized the world had the same spirit of sincerity and honesty and frankness characterized the purposes of other nations as that which was manifested by this country. Our plea for disarmament has been rejected.

For this we are in no way to blame. Disappointed and disillusioned, we have but one course left, to provide an adequate national defense of which the Navy must be the foremost factor.

We had been led to believe that the World War was a war to end wars, and that we were to make the world safe for democracy. We have been disappointed in both of these hopes. Dictatorships today threaten democracy and the world has again become an armed camp. Each week brings new fears and forebodings. Treaties, pacts, agreements, and covenants appear to be but idle gestures or shameful conventionalities as one nation after another repudiates its solemn obligations whenever its policies are questioned or its plans are opposed. Compliance with the mandates of the League of Nations might well be compared with the efforts at enforcement of that constitutional amendment which is remembered today as a noble experiment. With due solemnity decrees are made only to provide an opportunity for skillful diplomats to find an excuse for not enforcing them. The agility with which the executioner can ease its way out of an undesirable situation speaks well for foreign diplomacy even though it makes of the League a travesty and a farce. Sanctions are synonymous with suspicions. Our fondest hopes have been dashed to the ground as ruthless dictators have built gigantic machines of ruin to arouse a spirit of nationalism among their people to assure these masters an undistributed dominion over their subjects and to threaten by force the acceptance by other nations of their absolute demands. We have witnessed an increasing contemptuous indifference to international morality, and where there is no sense of morality there can be no security in agreements nor hope of understandings. Such are the problems as I see them. Such are the conditions with which we are confronted. What course should we follow?

With our hopes of understanding dissipated and our sense of security in agreements destroyed, what course can America pursue which will be compatible with national safety and what course should the Congress take in order to discharge our obligation to provide for the common defense? Shall we attempt to find safety by withdrawing from our contacts with other nations? "No man liveth unto himself" and no nation can live successfully unto itself. Isolation means stagnation and decadence. The recluse arouses our sympathy as he closes the doors of fellowship and deprives himself of the wealth of kindliness, inspiration, and helpfulness which springs from associations and friendships. Scrooge was a pathetic figure before the ghost of Marley visited him. A nation which shuns intercourse with other nations and holds itself aloof from contacts becomes even more pathetic. We cannot ignore world movements nor dissociate ourselves from tragedies enacted on the stage where we as a nation must play a leading role. The initiative, the ingenuity, the courage of America cannot be confined. We are a world power and as such must face facts, not fancies; we must deal in realities, not dreams; we must be practical, not idealistic.

I contend that we have an obligation to provide for the common defense. I contend that our primary duty is preparedness, if we are to enjoy a sense of self-protection. I contend that we should be able to command respect and not invite scorn and derision. I contend that we can bring a larger degree of influence upon world affairs and bring our contribution for world peace more effectively by self-assertiveness than by assuming an attitude of passive acquiescence. I contend that at this time an adequate national defense provides the best assurance of peace for America.

An adequate national defense depends primarily on an adequate naval establishment, and an adequate naval establishment must include modern equipment on the sea and in the air, strategic shore stations, and an efficient complement of officers and enlisted personnel trained and ready to execute a program in any emergency. The present bill provides for such a naval establishment. Some of us may take exception to some items, but, as a whole, the appropriations provided for in the bill represent the reasonable requirements of a naval program which has been authorized by the acts of Congress, which has been approved by a majority of the people of the country, and which is requisite for our national needs under present war conditions. We are building, equipping, and manning a treaty Navy. To do otherwise at this time would be folly. It would insure a repetition of the unpreparedness debacle of World War days and invite disaster. Contemporary events constitute an added and pointed lesson on the plight of a nation weak and unprepared for an emergency. I believe we should have a Navy comparable to the navy of any other nation of the world. I believe we should have this Navy as the most effective means of insuring peace for America. I believe that the present bill is the means of paying the premium for the necessary insurance policy for our safety and protection.

To be at peace with the other nations of the world is our fondest hope and our sincere purpose. To this end our every endeavor should be dedicated and it is my abiding conviction that a navy second to none constitutes a dedication to this cause. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I have the pleasure of introducing in the House today a House companion measure to Senator BARBOUR'S valuable bill, Senate 4031, which is entitled:

A bill to create a commission to enter into negotiations with respect to the refunding of certain obligations for foreign governments held by the United States, and for other purposes.

This bill calls for creation of a World War debt refunding commission. The commission would consist of five members, one of whom would be the Secretary of the Treasury, who would serve as chairman. The other four shall be, according to the bill, appointed by the President, by and with the advice of the Senate.

The commission would be authorized to enter into agreements with foreign governments with a view to refunding or converting the obligations of such foreign governments now held by the United States arising out of the World War into bonds or other obligations of these governments in substitution for the bonds or other obligations now held by the United States. The term, form, conditions, date or dates of maturity, and the rate or rates of interest will also be established by the commission, with such security, if any, as shall be deemed for the best interests of our country.

The bill also provides that the commission shall make a report to the President and the Congress in January of each year of its activities under this act. The report shall include also recommendations from the commission in the matters to which this act relates. The commission shall make a final report on the termination of its activities. It shall also transmit to the Congress immediately copies of each agreement entered into with a foreign government under the act, but no such agreement shall become effective until further action by the Congress.

The bill provides also the commission shall cease to exist upon the expiration of 3 years after the date of enactment.

So much for the mechanics of this measure. Let me point out to you just briefly its very evident and valuable features.

In the first place, it is imperative that something be done—and done soon—to have amortized our loans to our Allies in the World War. This bill suggests one way to do it. I believe, after careful study of the means suggested in the measure, you will agree that this momentous problem can only be solved by thorough and diligent investigation through a commission such as this bill would create. Having the Secretary of the Treasury as its chairman, we can be assured the commission would act entirely in accordance with the foreign policy of the Executive. With the President selecting the four other members of this commission, that assurance is strengthened. This commission is given, under this measure, full and specific power to act "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." This is entirely as it should be.

Furthermore, the Executive is more thoroughly protected by the wording of the second section of the bill, which says:

Subject to the approval of the President, the commission is authorized to enter into negotiations.

The Congress is protected in that the measure declares that a yearly report shall be made to the Congress; that all agreements suggested shall be printed and transmitted to the Congress before any such agreement shall become effective.

One of the most valuable features of the bill is that the commission shall cease to exist upon the expiration of 3 years after enactment. We have seen entirely too unwieldly a bureaucracy created in our National Government. The act, by disbanding the commission within 3 years, gives us the certainty that we shall get quick and impartial action.

Our American taxpayers have suffered long enough under the financial burden imposed by the defaults of the foreign governments. It seems to me that insufficient emphasis has been placed lately on the war-debt situation. Now is the time to demand, and to get, action looking toward the refunding of the just and overdue obligations of our debtor Allies.

When the United States entered the World War we were hailed as the "saviors of liberty." Our Allies welcomed the manpower we threw into the conflict. They welcomed our munitions, our ships, our equipment. Moreover, they welcomed our money. Most of our boys, thank God, came back. Practically none of our money did.

It is regrettable that many of our former Allies see fit to belittle the contribution the United States made toward winning the war. Four million of our best young manhood was sent abroad. They were fresh, young, trained troops. They were thrown into the breach and the histories of today record the valor, the courage, and indomitable will to conquer, which they manifested. Our equipment came at a time when the Allies were frantically in need of it. Our money went to them at a time when they were desperate for funds.

I believe it is not too much to say that were it not for the entrance of the United States into the World War, France, England, and perhaps Italy and some other nations would today be vassal states, and would have lost their liberty if not their sovereignty.

The nations which we aided—Belgium, France, England, Russia, and Italy—can never repay us in dollars and cents for what the preservation of their freedom cost us in blood and treasure. Our entry into the conflict stemmed the tide which had been flowing steadily against the Allies. Our entry formed the turning point of the war. We can rightly say that it is due to us, and to us alone, that these countries were able to keep their places in the sun.

Besides our investment in manpower and equipment, we spent millions of our own money on our share of the war. When we entered the war our national debt was about $1,000,000,000. At the close of the war we had increased the national debt to more than twenty-six billions.

This was the money we spent as our personal share of the cost of the war, and does not include the tremendous loans we made to foreign countries.

It is to be remembered and stressed that the United States practically charged nothing to its Allies for munitions, implements of war, and the costs of the conflict. The loans which we know as war debts are primarily commercial loans.

The foreign nations who are branding our people as usurers forget the fact that we forgave them very substantial parts of their loans. For instance, we were owed over four billions and a half dollars by the British Government. Of that, when we refunded for them, we forgave a billion and a half, or 30 percent of the loan. France owed us originally four billions two hundred and thirty millions, and we forgave them two billions and a half, or 60 percent. Italy, which owed us two billion a hundred and fifty million, was forgiven to the extent of a billion seven hundred million, or 80 percent of the loan. Belgium, although she only owed us four hundred and eighty-three millions, was forgiven three hundred millions, or 60 percent of the loan.

Usurers do not "forgive" debts. Such forgiveness was the act of a friendly nation willing and ready to cooperate with its Allies to help them establish themselves on a firm financial footing.

Such benefactions should have earned for us the gratitude of the European countries we saved from vassalage. If they are duly grateful, they are exhibiting their gratitude in strange ways, first by defaulting on their debts and then calling us "usurers" for trying to collect them.

There is no precedent in the history of this country for the kind of treatment we have received from our debtor allies. At the close of the Revolutionary War, President Washington and Secretary of the Treasury Hamilton assured our creditors that they would be paid in full and with interest. France is now one of our debtors. She has defaulted. How would she have felt if we had defaulted the loans she made us during the Revolutionary War? It is history that France made the loans to us then, not because of any great love for America but because we were fighting her ancient enemy, England. She was willing to do all she could for the sole purpose of weakening England—and not for the purpose of helping the United States. Yet we paid our debt to her with interest. In contrast to that consider the France of today, which borrowed our money to preserve its own liberty, and for no other reason, and then refuses to pay back its loans!

Europe sometimes makes the excuse that America made profit from its loans. That is the excuse of the dishonest debtor. How can we make profit from a loan that was not repaid, either in principal or in interest?

It is to be remembered and emphasized that a great percentage of these so-called war-debt loans were commercial transactions. A large part of the money was loaned after the war was over. These nations borrowed from us for the purpose of rehabilitating themselves. There was then "no common enemy" to face. The war was over. Peace reigned once more and ravaged Europe was trying to reestablish itself. For that purpose they borrowed more money from a gullible and free-handed United States. This part of the war debts has gone into default along with that which was loaned them while the conflict still raged.

Were these nations unable to pay us, we could treat them as insolvent debtors. However, they are more than able to comfortably repay the United States. The only thing that stops them from making repayment is the evident and total lack of desire to repay. They prefer, naturally, to permit our taxpayers to assume the burden which should be theirs. They apparently feel no shame for such dishonesty. Their only feeling on the question of the war debts is a resentment that we should even expect to be repaid.

Let us investigate the ability of these nations to repay. We have used England, France, Belgium, and Italy as examples thus far. To continue the comparison, if the British people wanted to fully and completely repay the United States, they would only have to give us 4 cents of each dollar now expended by their Government. I do not believe there is an individual in this country who, to clear up an honest obligation, would not be willing to put aside 4 cents from each dollar he spends to take care of that debt. There is no logical reason why any nation should be less honorable than a private creditor.

To continue, Italy would only have to pay us 1.3 cents from every dollar she spends for governmental purposes; and France and Belgium would only have to pay us 2 cents each for each dollar they spend.

Think for a moment what it would mean to our tax-burdened people were these foreign governments to repay us the war-debt money. The municipalities of the Empire State have a funded debt of about three billions two hundred millions. Figuring that this State pays one-fifth of the Federal taxes, it would receive from payments of the war debts about $3,000,000,000—enough to wipe out the debts of all the municipalities in that State. What is true in the Empire State will be true in all of the other 47 States of the Union. Prompt and honorable payment of the war debts would go a long way to removing many of our taxation worries.

The attitude of our Government during the various administrations since the World War, including the present one, has been most charitable and kind toward our debtors. In fact, it has been too charitable and too kind. If this war-debt money we loaned Europe were something we had obtained by a wave of a magic financial wand, we could view the defaults of our debtors with equanimity, if not with satisfaction. However, this money is not something we pulled like rabbits from a financial hat. It is the money of our American taxpayers. If the European countries do not make good the loans, our taxpayers must.

These debts must be paid. The issue today is whether our Government is going to ask the foreign countries to repay them or whether they will insist on saddling them on our own taxpayers. There is no middle choice. Either Europe pays its own debts or our people pay for them. I do not believe it is right for any administration to permit its taxpayers to assume another country's burdens. France, Great Britain, Italy, and the rest can pay.

We are hearing in the daily papers of the tremendous unrest abroad. Europe is a tinder box which is liable to flame into another horrible war any moment. Nation is arming against nation. Bitterness and international strife are in the air. How can European peoples permit themselves to be drawn into another war when they have not yet paid for the last one?

England spent during the past fiscal year $686,736,147 for armaments of all kinds. France spent $688,584,175; Italy, $956,399,400; and Belgium, $231,317,447. Their payments on the war debts this year, if they were made, would amount to $9,720,765.95 for Great Britain, $3,046,879.72 for France, $896,155.88 for Italy, and $484,453.88 for Belgium. In other words, to pay their installments on the war debts this year these countries would only have to pay a percentage of the money they are now spending on armaments alone. The percentage Great Britain would have to pay would be only one-hundredth of 1 percent; for France it would be four-thousandths of 1 percent; for Italy nine-tenths of 1 percent; and for Belgium two-thousandths of 1 percent. Let me impress upon you that these percentages are based on the best obtainable and authentic figures at this time and represent the percentage of their war-debt payments as against the money they are now spending for armaments. What is true for these countries mentioned is largely true for all our debtors.

I believe the resolution by Senator BARBOUR, for which I have today introduced a House companion, would go a long way toward solving, in a friendly, equitable manner, our war-debt problem. The need for such a solution is immediate. We cannot permit our taxpayers to any longer assume the debts of these foreign nations. With the help of you gentlement this war-debt problem will be effectively solved, and the American taxpayer will be relieved of at least a part of the tremendous burden he is now carrying.

On behalf of the taxpayers, on behalf of our country, I solicit the aid and cooperation of every Member of the House to effect the solution of our war debts.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, in the 2 minutes allotted to me I want to briefly refer to the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER] in reference to the selective law. Let me call attention to the fact that the selective law was passed years ago, when the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Butler, was chairman of the committee. At that time it was, and still is, the opinion of those who are well informed about it that it is the most fair and equitable system ever devised in reference to promotion and retirement.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER] pointed out that the legislation ought to follow the Army plan. What is the difference? Briefly, it is this: Stagnation was so bad in the Army—lieutenants had reached the age of 40 and 50 years and could not be promoted until Congress came in with a blanket promotion of six or seven thousand Army officers.

The merit system enters into the selective system of the Navy. It does not give the ranking officer a promotion; he is not promoted when some officer above him retires or dies.

I submit that the selection law is a fair and equitable method of grouping the officers, taking the list of names of certain officers, and determining who is best fitted for the next in command. As years go on it will be in the interest of economy instead of a burden on the taxpayer.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Will the chairman of the committee yield to the gentleman from Georgia in order that I may ask him a question?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia 1 minute.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. DITTER. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he would acknowledge that the Army plan might provide a more equitable and fairer system and also entail less expense to the taxpayer?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. On the contrary, if you retire a man at a youthful age instead of 64, where under the law they get 2½ percent of the basic pay, it is more economical.

Mr. DITTER. The gentleman will acknowledge that we have a board of men forcing into retirement officers that would not otherwise be forced into retirement?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is absolutely true.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, how much time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 22 minutes remaining.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield that time to myself, and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I announced yesterday that every member of the naval subcommittee and every member of the Committee on Appropriations profoundly regretted the inability of the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Navy Department, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARY], to be present and handle this bill. I suppose I feel his absence perhaps more keenly than any other member of the subcommittee, because, of necessity, I was called upon to take charge of this bill and handle it in his absence. I recognize full well my inability to take his place or to handle the bill in the House as he would have done if he could have been here.

The Budget estimate of appropriations for the next fiscal year for the Navy Department carries a larger amount for the Navy than has been appropriated for the current fiscal year. The current appropriation bill, including reappropriations, carried $489,275,975. For 1937 the Budget proposes $549,591,299, which is an increase over the appropriations for this fiscal year of $60,315,324. We have effected net reductions totaling $18,522,592. The total of our bill is therefore $531,068,707, or an increase over the appropriations for the current fiscal year of $41,792,732.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not undertake in the remaining few minutes to cover in detail all the items of this bill. I do, however, desire to call to the attention of the members of the Committee certain items involved in this measure. Much of this increase we are called upon to consider is caused by two things, namely, new legislation and taking up projects inadequately financed by allotments of relief funds. As to the latter, $31,951,000 is carried in this bill, not for the completion, but toward the completion of 32 vessels started under an N. R. A. allotment of $238,000,000. This allotment, it appears, will be about $59,000,000 short of the amount needed for the completion of those vessels, including the provision of ordnance spares and reserves. We are also carrying in this bill funds to complete a number of radio stations initially provided for with N. R. A. allotments.

Of course, this bill very largely is beyond our control as an appropriating committee. Our naval policy is established pursuant to law by the administration. We have committed ourselves to the maintenance of a Navy of a certain size; that extends to ships, aircraft, to personnel, and to the shore establishment. The task of our committee, as I see it, is to see that the appropriations are held to the bare minimum necessary to provide and support such a Navy consistent with good business judgment and ordinary common sense.

As previously indicated, the Budget estimates for the Navy exceed the sum of current appropriations, including in the latter reappropriations amounting to $7,544,596, by $60,315,324.

This increase divides, generally and roundly, as follows:

Personnel, Regular Navy and Marine Corps and Reserve forces	$20,000,000
Maintenance and operation of the Navy, exclusive of service personnel	6,500,000
Construction of ships	49,500,000

The principal offset against this increase is in the estimate for public works, which is, roundly, $14,000,000 less than the amount that has been made available for the present fiscal year.

The personnel increase is incident to several factors. I only intend to mention a few of them:

(1) Increasing enlisted strength of Navy from 93,500 to 100,000 ..... $10,527,114

That is due partly to the policy to which we are committed of maintaining 85-percent complements on all combatant vessels and on submarines 100-percent complements, and to additional vessels that will be in commission during 1937—an average of 319.6 as against 312.3 this year—and also to vessels coming into commission early in the fiscal year 1938, for which crews will have to be assembled in advance.

We have reduced the estimate for pay of men by $949,103 because we found too many in the higher pay grades. What was considered to be a proper grade distribution of enlisted men of treaty-navy strength was incorporated in last year's hearings, and we found that said distribution had not been adhered to in the preparation of the 1937 Budget, and we had the estimate recalculated to conform with that treaty-navy distribution, with the result that we get a saving of $949,103.

(2) Five appointments to the Naval Academy $589,937

Permanent law authorizes five appointments. By limitation the number was held to three over a long period of years; raised to four one year; put back to three the next; raised to four last year; and for next year the Budget proposes that the controlling limitation be dropped, which automatically would make the number five. We have not had five appointments since the fiscal year 1923.

We are disregarding the Budget and making provision for four.

There has been so much dissatisfaction over the selection arrangement, both in and out of the Navy, that the General Board has been making a study of the whole subject, and we are advised has come to conclusions which will be laid before Congress at the next session, which if approved will reduce separations and make five appointments unnecessary. As a matter of fact, the Navy Department has submitted within the last few days to the Bureau of the Budget a recommendation for a modification of the Budget estimate to provide for four instead of five appointments to Annapolis.

There would be an additional expense in connection with five appointments to provide for more dormitory space. The Budget includes $147,000 for beginning the work, which would cost to complete $750,000. The $147,000 and the other amounts we have eliminated by adhering to four appointments make a total of $441,609. Some of the Budget increase has been permitted to stand because of an estimated larger number of students on the four-appointment basis than first appeared likely.

(3) Normal increases incident to longevity and retirement, Navy and Marine Corps $6,920,763

This increase is incident to promotion, higher pay periods, 5-percent pay increase after 3 years' service, growing retired lists, and a greater number of transferred enlisted men. There is a total of $3,426,902 in the estimate because of a bigger retired list and a larger number of transferred men. By transferred men I mean enlisted men who transfer to the Naval Reserve after 16 or 20 years' service.

I feel that I should call attention again to the growing cost of transferred members of the Naval Reserve; that is, enlisted men of the Navy who transfer to the Naval Reserve after 16 or 20 years' service. The law, as amended, requires 20 years' service as to those men enlisting after such amendment. After the combined service in the Regular Navy and in the Naval Reserve of such transferred men equals 30 years they become eligible for the retired list. The estimate for pay of transferred men—15,742—for 1937 is $13,790,890 and for retired enlisted men—5,748—$6,891,254. The two combined exceed the sum of the current year appropriations by $2,507,063. Serious consideration might well be given to the repeal of the transfer law, which of itself defeats building up a most effective and inexpensive reserve through men not reenlisting who now are induced to remain in the service to earn, after 20 years' service, an annuity of $1,135 average until they reach a retired status, and $1,248 average after being retired.

We have added $84,220 to meet the expense of the bill just sent to the President for approval amending the Marine Corps Personnel Act of 1934.

(4) Expansion of Reserve activities, Navy and Marine Corps $1,719,720

If you will turn to page 195 of the hearings, you will find a break-down of the Naval Reserve increase, and on page 658 there is an itemization of the increase touching the Marine Corps Reserve.

As to the latter, the committee has made a net increase of $16,234, which represents an addition of $48,307 for pay for the aviation branch and a reduction of $32,073 in the project to give 45 days' training to college students with a view to developing a force of 650 platoon leaders, which the committee feels should be obtained more gradually.

Of the net increase of $1,437,175 for Naval Reserve activities, the committee has deducted $921,531, all itemized on page 6 of the report. I invite your attention to that list.

The estimate for naval ship construction is $182,500,000. Of that amount, $168,519,631 is intended for carrying forward work on or completing 88 vessels.

There will be available for expenditure on account of such vessels, in addition to the appropriation now asked, $33,397,868 of prior year appropriations and an amount upward of $26,000,000 of the N. R. A. allotment of $238,000,000, or a total availability for expenditure on account of such vessels of $227,917,499. We have reduced the total estimate by $14,000,000.

There was much objection last year when the committee proposed to reduce the estimate of $152,500,000 by $14,690,000. We have found that there will be a balance at the end of this fiscal year of about $19,000,000 in excess of the amount we proposed to reduce the estimate.

For laying down new ships the Budget includes $13,980,369 on account of 12 destroyers and 6 submarines, to cost in all $113,958,000. Each of the destroyers is estimated to cost $6,463,000 and each of the submarines $6,067,000.

All of this new construction is in continuation of the program to provide replacements for destroyers and submarines which have become over age, and is in keeping with the policy to have the Navy of treaty strength in under-age ships.

After the 12 destroyers we are providing for here, we shall still need to build 23 to give us our treaty allowance of 150,000 tons, all under age.

Our treaty allowance of submarines is 52,700 tons. After the six we are providing for in this bill we shall need to build eight more to have all of our submarines under age.

With these smaller vessels out of the way we shall be in very fine shape. We are building replacements now for 2 of the 10 light cruisers of the Omaha class. None of the other eight comes up for replacement before 1940.

As to our 15 battleships, the replacements for 3 may be laid down in 1937; then they come along, 4 in 1939, 1 in 1940, and so forth.

Since the presentation of the Budget there has been concluded another naval conference from which has issued a new naval treaty, signed by the plenipotentiaries of our own Government and the Governments of France and Great Britain on March 25, 1936. The Washington Treaty, signed February 6, 1922, fixed the life of a battleship at 20 years. The London Naval Treaty, signed April 22, 1930, suspended the replacement of battleships during the life of that treaty, which expires December 31, 1936. The new naval treaty provides that a capital ship becomes over age 26 years after its completion. However, after December 31, 1936, under the new treaty, if ratified, there will be no prohibition upon laying down new capital ships between 17,500 and 35,000 tons, and, if not ratified, no prohibition whatsoever as to ships of any category or character.

Applying the 26-year principle and the further principle of the Washington Treaty permitting the laying down of replacement tonnage 3 years before the vessels they replace become over age, we have three battleships the replacement of which may be commenced at any time in the calendar year 1937, namely, the Arkansas, which will have been completed 26 years in 1938, and the Texas and New York, which will have been completed 26 years in 1940.

In view of the freedom of action permissible as to battleship replacement after December 31, 1936, and the evident determination of our Government, voiced in the Vinson-Trammell Act of March 27, 1934, and in subsequent legislation, to maintain a navy second to none, the committee feels that the means should be available for matching any battleship construction that may be undertaken by any of the other signatory powers to the London Treaty, signed April 22, 1930, or to the new treaty, signed March 25, 1936. The committee is unwilling to recommend that our Navy Department be given authority to go ahead with the replacement of battleships without restriction.

Our Government, which has taken the lead in moves to contribute to the maintenance of the general peace and to reduce the burdens of competition in armament, should be the last to take the initiative. We are proposing to meet such a contingency in this way:

Not more than two capital ships, as replacements of average capital ships, to be undertaken only in the event that capital ship replacement construction is commenced by any of the other signatory powers to the treaty for the limitation and reduction of naval armament signed at London, April 22, 1930.

There is one other matter I think I should bring to your attention. You will find on page 430 of the hearings a statement of the estimated additional cost to the Navy during the fiscal year 1937 of the new leave legislation which just recently was enacted. The estimated additional load is $8,348,869, which will have to be absorbed or provided for later in the way of a supplemental appropriation. It would be rather interesting to have the figure as to the entire Federal service.

Mr. Chairman, my time is running short and I shall have to conclude, but before doing so, I wish to express my appreciation for the splendid cooperation I have received from my colleagues on the subcommittee and for the cordial support I have had thus far from the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], who is chairman of the Naval Legislative Committee, and from his very able committee colleague the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DREWRY]. I also want to express my profound thanks and appreciation to the able and efficient clerk to our subcommittee, Mr. Pugh.

I shall be glad to contribute any additional information that may be desired as to the bill when it is read under the 5-minute rule. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY

MISCELLANEOUS EXPENSES

For traveling expenses of civilian employees, including not to exceed $2,500 for the expenses of attendance, at home and abroad, upon meetings of technical, professional, scientific, and other similar organizations when, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, such attendance would be of benefit in the conduct of the work of the Navy Department; not to exceed $2,000 for the part-time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of such experts and at such rates of compensation as may be contracted for by and in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy; expenses of courts martial, purchase of law and reference books, expenses of prisoners and prisons, courts of inquiry, boards of investigation, examining boards, clerical assistance; witnesses' fees and traveling expenses; not to exceed $15,000 for promoting accident prevention and safety in shore establishments of the Navy, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy; newspapers and periodicals for the naval service; all advertising of the Navy Department and its bureaus (except advertising for recruits for the Bureau of Navigation); costs of suits; relief of vessels in distress; recovery of valuables from shipwrecks; maintenance of attachés abroad, including office rental and pay of employees, and not to exceed $8,000 in the aggregate or $900 for any one person for allowances for living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light, as authorized by the act approved June 26, 1930 (U. S. C., title 5, sec. 118a); the collection and classification of information; not to exceed $185,000 for telephone, telegraph, and teletype rentals and tolls, telegrams, radiograms, and cablegrams; postage, foreign and domestic and post-office box rentals; necessary expenses for interned persons and prisoners of war under the jurisdiction of the Navy Department, including funeral expenses for such interned persons or prisoners of war as may die while under such jurisdiction; payment of claims for damages as provided in the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year 1920, approved July 11, 1919 (U. S. C., title 34, sec. 600); and other necessary and incidental expenses; in all, $1,132,500: Provided, That no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be available for the expense of any naval district in which there may be an active navy yard, naval training station, or naval operating base, unless the commandant of the naval district shall be also the commandant of one of such establishments: Provided further, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for employees assigned to group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department shall not exceed $515,000.

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this naval appropriation bill and am going to vote against it. I know there is no hope of defeating this exorbitant naval appropriation, but I do feel that I must make my protest not only against this bill but against the whole procedure by which this has been handled. Here is a bill for over a half billion dollars—surely a sum worthy of great consideration. Yet what are we asked to do? We were given this bill with the report yesterday afternoon and were graciously allowed the privilege of even reading the printed hearings on the bill, the object being to read the bill, report, and hearings while the debate is going on. That is a fine way to prepare to vote on a half billion dollars. And today we are expected to vote.

Now, for several weeks I have been calling the Appropriations Committee, hoping to be able to get a copy of the bill, hearings, and report in time to give it all the study it deserves. Being no more than an average fast reader, I have not even been able to read the bill, report, and hearings. We were prepared to spend all this week on the tax bill, and yet we get this bill crammed down our throats. It might be the best bill in the world, or it might be the worst, but there is surely not sufficient time to make a careful study to formulate an accurate judgment.

With this bill America has finally jumped into the armament race with both feet, politely claiming that it is no race but a mere desire to keep even. Why this unprecedented expenditure, and against whom are we arming? Just a glance over the record is enough to convince any sane man that something vital is wrong. If we are going to spend our money, let us take the time to make sure that we are getting something for it. We hear a lot about economy, and yet I can find nothing in the bill to indicate that there is any intention to cut down the excessive expenditures on the Atlantic seaboard naval bases. For years it has been advocated that only the bases at New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and Norfolk need be continued. In late years our naval problems have all centered on the Pacific, yet we are content to continue seven navy yards on the Atlantic seaboard. Our bid for commercial supremacy is primarily in the Pacific. Thus, either war or peace tactics would indicate the justice of the contention that much economy could be practiced.

Loud wails are heard that because of reduced appropriations since the war we have been unable to maintain our Navy and keep it at treaty strength. Competent officials say that is so, but I challenge anyone to find out why it is so.

The period during which we lost so badly apparently was from 1923 through 1934. For those years our naval appropriations amounted to $4,052,000,000; Great Britain, $3,342,000,000; Japan, $1,657,000,000; France, $937,000,000.

This armament race seems to be divided into two heats; the United States wins the first heat in that we are able to spend more money, but we run a poor third in the second heat, which is in getting something for our money.

This is a regular appropriation, not a relief measure. It is part of the housekeeping expenses of our Government—one more burden upon the average taxpayer. At a time when we are concentrating every effort toward the relief of unemployment and protecting millions of our citizens from the tragedy of actual starvation we can well consider how we spend our substance. Adequate national defense? Yes. Ever-increasing and practically unlimited expenditures? No. [Applause.]

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Georgia has expressed regret that an appropriation for national defense should be the subject of partisan controversy. I would call his attention to the fact that the Democratic Party has itself made it a partisan issue, for in its 1932 platform his party declared for—

> A Navy and Army adequate for national defense based on a survey of all facts affecting the existing establishments, that the people in time of peace may not be burdened by an expenditure fast approaching $1,000,000,000 annually.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I yield.

Mr. BIERMANN. The gentleman has quoted from the Democratic platform. He has stated that the Democratic Party made it a partisan issue. Will not the gentleman be so fair as to quote the Republican platform on the same subject showing they made it a partisan issue?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. If I had the Republican platform at hand, I should be glad to quote its plank on armaments. I would suggest that the gentleman himself might be able to furnish the language.

Mr. BIERMANN. I shall do so.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I would ask him to do it in his own time, however, because I have only 5 minutes.

The plank I read was the Democratic promise. What was the performance? Has there been the reduction in military and naval appropriations impliedly pledged in the platform?

In this, as in many other matters, the record shows that the promise has been kept—in reverse.

In 1934 naval expenditures were $297,029,000, and in 1935, $436,448,000. The naval appropriation for 1936 was $483,468,000, and the 1937 Budget calls for $551,308,000.

The naval Budget for 1937 exceeds the expenditures for 1934 by $254,279,000. Military and naval expenditures for 1937 will be more than $1,000,000,000, even if the administration does not divert a single dollar of "relief funds" to military and naval purposes next year.

Whenever we of the minority criticize the top-heavy Budgets of the present administration we are asked in a tone that indicates that the question itself should silence all opposition: "Where would you make the cuts?"

Speaking for myself alone, I would suggest that the bill we are now considering offers a good place to start. In making that statement I am supporting the Democratic platform—the platform on which the Democrats rode into power in 1932, but which they have consistently and completely ignored since they were elected.

We have heard much of late about the "good neighbor" policy. It has been publicized in such a way as to leave the impression that it is something new and unique. How does the naval policy of the administration square with its "good neighbor" professions? Does a good neighbor prove his neighborliness by buying more guns and laying in larger stocks of ammunition to be used against one or more of the neighbors?

The Nye committee has disclosed how munitions manufacturers have in the past helped involve us in war. By providing more business for these same "merchants of death" we are giving them proof of our willingness to be cooperative and encouraging them to continue the propaganda by which nations that want to be neighborly, and even friendly, are induced to fly at each other's throats.

I would suggest that the party in power, at its forthcoming convention at Philadelphia, write this plank into its platform:

We promise, in spite of the badly unbalanced condition of the national Budget and a national debt approaching $40,000,000,000, in spite of increasing unemployment and lengthening relief rolls, to continue to expand the military and naval Budgets without regard to cost. We promise to give munitions manufacturers funds appropriated for bread for the poor. We promise to encourage by our enthusiastic participation that race of death which leads toward another great war, toward universal bankruptcy, toward the eclipse of liberty, and the final destruction of civilization.

Be honest, write that plank into your platform, and then await the verdict of the people! [Applause.]

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

The gentleman from Minnesota, to support his accusation of partisanship, read the plank of the Democratic platform of 1932 relating to national defense. It is my purpose now to turn back that challenge as is right fit to the Republican Party. He did not tell what the leaders of the Republican administration did to this country in the way of bankrupting it and piling up debt, making shortages in personal income and corporate income and national income.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. Pardon me, I have not the time.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I supposed we were discussing——

Mr. BIERMANN. I have not yielded to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman. I will if I have time after reading this plank of the platform. The gentleman wants me to read the Republican platform plank on armament. It is not a concise plank like the Democratic plank is, but it is one that includes everything. It is for reduction of armament and for increase of armament, for arbitration and against arbitration, for internationalism and for nationalism. I read now from the Republican platform:

Reduction of armament: Conscious that the limitation of armament will contribute to security against war, and that the financial burdens of military preparation have been shamefully increased throughout the world, the administration under President Hoover has made steady efforts and marked progress in the direction of proportional reduction of arms by agreement with other nations. Upon his initiative a treaty between the chief naval powers at London in 1930, following the path marked by the Washington conference of 1922, established a limitation of all types of fighting ships on a proportionate basis as between the three great naval powers. For the first time, a general limitation of a most costly branch of armament was successfully accomplished.

In the Geneva Disarmament Conference now in progress America is an active participant, and a representative delegation of our citizens is laboring for further progress in a cause to which this country has been an earnest contributor. This policy will be pursued.

Meanwhile the maintenance of our Navy on the basis of parity with any nation is a fundamental policy to which the Republican Party is committed. While in the interest of necessary Government retrenchment, humanity, and relief of the taxpayer we shall continue to exert our full influence upon the nations of the world in the cause of reduction of arms, we do not propose to reduce our Navy defenses below that of any other nation.

National defense: Armaments are relative and therefore flexible and subject to change as necessity demands. We believe that in time of war every material resource in the Nation should bear its proportionate share of the burdens occasioned by the public need and that it is a duty of government to perfect plans in time of peace whereby this objective may be attained in war. We support the essential principles of the National Defense Act as amended in 1920 by the Air Corps Act of 1926 and believe that the Army of the United States has through successive reductions accomplished in the last 12 years reached the irreducible minimum consistent with the self-reliance, self-respect, and security of this country.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield if the gentleman will tell me in a few words what that means.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The gentleman calls upon me to make a half hour's speech, for I presume it would require that much time to discuss fully everything contained in that plank; I shall not do that, but merely call the gentleman's attention to the fact that under Republican administrations an honest effort was made to get the nations together to reduce armaments. Furthermore, under the last Republican administration the appropriations for the Army and Navy were several hundred million dollars lower than they have been under this administration. The gentleman will also concede that under this administration those appropriations have increased progressively so that we have now passed by over $100,000,000 the $1,000,000,000 goal which the Democratic platform said we were approaching and which the Democrats in 1932 viewed with so much alarm.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. BIERMANN. No one has been more opposed to the appropriations of the last several years than I have, and I am going to vote against this bill.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Good.

Mr. BIERMANN. I have not voted for an Army appropriation bill or for a Navy appropriation bill since I have been in Congress. I do not expect to vote for any until they are reduced below what they have been; but the gentleman certainly should not indict the Democratic Party for failure to try to make international arrangements to maintain peace, because a Democratic administration was the originator of that type of thing, and a Republican Senate, for nothing but the basest kind of partisan motives, defeated that effort.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am not going to get into an argument with the gentleman from Iowa with reference to the League of Nations, but I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa the reason this budget is so much is due to the failure of the Republican Party in the Hoover administration to carry out the platform which the gentleman from Iowa has just read. It is now incumbent upon the Democrats to afford the country the national defense which the gentleman's party failed to afford when they were in power.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I should like to make the observation that as far as the Republicans are concerned they built a Navy, as they did in the Harding administration, then sank it and came back to build it all over again; so what are they talking about?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last six words.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just spoken stated that he has not voted for a national defense bill since he has been in Congress.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, let me correct that. I do not want to haggle about a national defense bill or have it hung on something I voted against. I am as much for national defense as any Member of the House.

Mr. MICHENER. I cannot yield further because the gentleman is taking too much of my time. Possibly I misquoted him, although I understood him that way. He probably said that he had never voted for a Navy bill.

Mr. BIERMANN. Or an Army bill.

Mr. MICHENER. Or an Army bill. There may be a distinction between a national defense bill and an Army bill and a Navy bill, but if there is, I do not quite understand it.

Mr. Chairman, unlike the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIERMANN], I have never voted against a national defense bill since

I have been a Member of Congress. However, I feel constrained to vote against the pending bill.

I am going to vote against this bill for several reasons.

First. I believe the Congress, the direct representatives of the people, should determine if, when, and how the national defense, which, of course, contemplates the Army and the Navy, should be increased or decreased. The matter of discretion is involved, and the power to make these momentous decisions should not be delegated to the Executive or any bureau of the Government. Our Army and Navy are most efficient, and we must rely much upon them. At the same time the policy should be determined by the Congress. Naval men become navy-minded just the same as bureaucrats believe in expanding bureaus.

During the depression Congress has appropriated large sums of money for relief. And the executive branch has been given authority to determine where this money should be expended. Without any initial authority from the Congress the Executive, through the N. R. A. and the P. W. A., entered upon naval projects, and now in this bill the Congress is asked to appropriate money to complete these projects, which were never authorized before the initial work was done and millions of dollars expended. Under the guise of emergency legislation no branch of our Government should be permitted to initiate public expenditures that must be carried on for years.

This same policy has been pursued by the Executive in reference to various reclamation, irrigation, and other projects, like Passamaquoddy Bay and the Florida canal. In short, we have reached the time when the people are demanding that the Congress take a hand in the matter of determining where the money is to be spent.

Second. I am very much opposed to the building of any additional capital warships or dreadnaughts at this time. I understand fully that the building of such ships is not made mandatory by this bill. However, again the President is given a certain discretion whereby upon the happening of certain events, in his judgment, he might commence the construction of two of these superdreadnaughts at a cost of approximately $103,000,000. That is the estimate, and we all know that the final cost will be much more. If this bill passes with this last provision, then it is pretty safe to say that before another year rolls around the work will have been inaugurated, possibly the keels will have been laid, and then, like the Florida ship canal, we will be asked to complete the work to save the money we have already invested, if for no other purpose.

I am not unmindful of the provision in the bill indicating that the Executive should not commence the construction of these two battleships unless signatory powers to the Limitations Treaty indicate their purpose to construct like ships.

In view of conditions in Europe today, is there any doubt in anybody's mind that work would not be commenced on these ships before next year's appropriation bill? The Congress will be in session in January next, and by that time we will definitely know as to whether or not we must build additional battleships if we are to keep pace with the other signatories. Then, again, inventions are being made so rapidly that it is altogether possible that we will not want superdreadnaughts in our scheme of things by the time these ships would be completed and available. I cannot see a single reason why this $103,000,000 and more should be authorized or appropriated at this time.

I yield to no one so far as my belief in adequate national defense is concerned. What is adequate defense? I have received several letters within the last week asking me that very question. We all know that the matter is controversial. Even our Military Establishments cannot agree as to the proportion of equipment. Some believe in large ships; others in destroyers; many in the air forces—so, after all, it is difficult to state just what constitutes adequate national defense. Our people want such defense, but they want no more at this time. In these days we should be thinking about curtailing expenses and balancing the Budget; which, of course, means taking some of the burden off the backs of the taxpayers. Every dollar unnecessarily spent for battleships takes just that much money out of the pockets of the average man and woman in the country, and to that extent deprives those taxpayers of benefits which they would otherwise enjoy.
